THE GLORIOUS CHRISTMAS MORNING.

WRITTEN FOR THE UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST, BY SKETCHER.

On old Judea's grassy plains
Reclined a shepherd band,
Keeping their trusty watch by night
Beneath the moonbeams bland.
Unnumbered stars in splendor gemm'd
The arch of Heaven's blue,
And not a lowering cloud was there
To dim its Beauty's hue.

Half dozing oft, they dreamed of those
Who to their hearts were dear,
The memory of whose fond love
Was wont their watch to cheer;
And fain they'd have the rosy morn
From out the east to come,
That each, again, might quick seek
His peaceful cottage home.

They little thought how seriously
That coming morn would break,
Or to what sight magnificent
Each sleeping eye would wake.
They knew not of the brightsome sun
That coming would brilliant rise,
Whose ray would chase the sun-clouds from,
Their sin's dark troubled skies.

The weary hours roll'd slowly on,
And midnight far was past,
When to their ears from out the skies
There came a trumpet blast.
Each starting sprang upon his feet,
And grasped his shepherds crook;
Then trembling sank upon the earth
With fear-depicted look.

With silv'ry notes the welkin rang
With strange unearthly lays
And seraph voices thrilling rose
In songs of joyful praise.
Rich music—soul-enchanting strains—
Now soft, now swelling clear—
Ne'er ceasing, now afar—
Now grazing full and near.

As though ten thousand magic harps
Were swept by master hands,
As though were joined the voices of
Ten thousand cherub bands.
The song of "Hallelujah" swelled
In witching numbers free;
The theme alone was HE who was,
And is, and is to be!

When raised they up their eyes to Heaven,
And lo! what sight was there!
A being of the upper world,
In spotless beauty rare.
The dazzling was that airy form,
Round which God's glory shone,
Too bright and fair that beaming face
For man to gaze upon.

They bowed their heads in terror down,
But that the angel said:
"Judea's children! look ye up!
Oh, be ye not afraid,
For once ye this day I bring
Good tidings of great joy,
Of one who comes into the world
To save, and not destroy.

"Be glad! be glad! This day is born
A saviour onto man—
A prince whose equal none hath known
Since first the world began!
In David's city ye shall find
This great and mighty king;
A manger for his cradle bed,
A meek and lowly thing."

And now upon the balmy air
These words came floating by,
"Be glory to all righteous God
The highest of the high!"
A pause then was there in the chant,
A touching strain—and then;
"Peace—peace be over all the earth
And good will onto men."

Now from the 'wilder'd shepherds sight
They faded slow away,
Just as the blushing east proclaimed
The breaking dawn of day.
And purple, gold, and crimson clouds
A hale usher'd them out,
As one by one the portals of
The spreading skies they pass'd.

THE SHEPHERDS' VISIT.

WRITTEN FOR THE UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST.

"And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into Heaven, the shepherds said one to another, let us now go even onto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is came to pass which the Lord hath made known onto us."—Mathew 17, 19.

No battlements to Bethlehem flung banners to the breeze—
No hosts in martial panoply were round the PRINCE OF PEACE—
No soldiers stern and steel-encased repaired thence lowly men.—
The humble now may go to Christ, as did the shepherds then.

No linen from Egyptian loom, no cloth of Tyrian dye,
No purple of imperial hue, were that babe's swaddling;
The shepherds saw no ragged seams, they marked no naked wall—
For Heaven's effulgent glorioumess had tranced their senses all.

One cloud did there in regal pomp, upon the infant wait,
Nor comet sound, nor trumpet brag to mark his royal state—
But to the shepherds, round the bed, the angel choir appeare,
The heavenly song of "Peace on earth" still echoeth in their ears.

They did not find the Holy Child with gold adorned and gem,
But the manger and the swaddling clothes suggest no doubt to them;
For, with the light from Heaven that spake the finding and accord,—
That Light whose from the infant's brow, and spake him CHRIST THE LORD.

And straightway forth, rejoicing then, those happy shepherds went,
And glorified the God on High, who hath salvation sent
Thus, to our souls when Light from Heaven proclaimeth Saviour born,
Take we the sure and humble path, which foolish worldings scorn.

KITTY CLARK, OR; The Christmas Gift.

WRITTEN FOR THE UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST, BY EZEKIEL JONES, ESQ.

It always seemed a kind of pity to me that the Continental Congress didn't make the Declaration of Independence in the Winter; for a holiday in Summer time always seems to me just as much out of place as mince apples, and cider with a hot sudiron in it, in the month of July. You can't mean rightly to enjoy it. Winter is the true time for celebrations, and jollifications, and raymee-pongks, as our Fanny's cousin in New York has always pronounced re-unions, since she took two French lessons. In the Spring there's the seed to put in, and in the Summer there's the weeds to pull up, the hay to make, and the early sauce to gather. In the Fall there's the harvest to be garnered; but in the Winter there's only a cord of wood to cut, a fence to mend, corn to shell and take to mill, a road to patch, and a nail to drive here and there at odd jobs. A body seems in the country to have no great to do, but to sit down and enjoy what a kind Providence has sent us, and, while he is taking his own comfort, to remember and relieve the poor, and comfort the distressed. Money and labor laid out that way yields about the best interest I ever found in my investment. My father found that out a long time ago, and he's [illegible] up to it—bless his kind old soul!

The Winter Holidays always give me a pang at each stray chaps and fortunes in the city; and I country to seek [illegible] we've been back to the old home, rather guess [illegible] barks, and hickory-nuts and butand tasted [illegible]-nuts, and filberts, and hazel-nuts, [illegible]-nuts, and bell-flowers, and golden russets, and [illegible]ine, and Rhode Island greenings, and [illegible]ter, you do kind of wish that Thanksgiving and Christmas did last all the year—don't you now! [illegible] then fried chicken for breakfast (father says they used to have a hot sling with allspice in it before breakfast, when he was a boy, but mother and Aunt Sally won't hear to that now)—and for dinner, go away starvation! Turkey roast—goose roast—pork roast—beef roast, but no boiled victuals—cracker pudding, baked, trembling with plums—pie pumpkin, pie apple, pie mince! Many's the time I've longed, after dinner, to wallow right down on the mat, before the great wood fire, to see if my hide wouldn't give a little, and let me have a chance to breathe after such a gormandizing. Nothing does the o'ld folks so much good as to find all this heap of provisions disappearing before the young generations; and if we don't eat enough to kill ourselves mother is right down angry. Conscience and order! How she does heap our plates!

Then after dinner comes the shooting at a mark—a snap at a tied turkey for fourpence ha'penny our money, which is equal to a fip, Philadelphia currency, or a shilling, York. I've seen an old gobbler fairly laugh at the boys who didn't touch his feathers, but once in a while there'd be sure to be somebody come up, who would reach his feelings. And after the shooting match the romp in the house, with our rosy country girls, strong as horses, and lively as crickets. Blind-man's buff; hunt the slipper, scum! pleased or displeased; come Philander, let us be a matching; twirling the pewter platter; puss, puss, in the corner—and some of them sly pusses too! But what's the use of tantalizing you poor chaps that can't come up here to enjoy these things, this Winter! I did think two days ago, that we shouldn't enjoy them much neither, for there's been a kind of a blight on our happiness this season. But this ain't telling my story.

Our help's name is Kitty Clark. We don't have servants in Jonesville; and there never was such a thing as a parlor bell or a chamber bell in the place but once. That was when Squire Smith built him a new house and got married, and thought he would enlighten the natives a little, so he bought things ought to be done. He had one of the best girls engaged for help that ever kneaded a pan of bread. Mrs. Smith, she rung the bell one morning. Nobody answered. She rung again, and then thought she would go out in the kitchen and see what had got Deborah, the help. She found her just putting on her things. "Now, Mrs. Smith," says Debby, "if you want somebody to be rung like a pig, you'll have to look further." The bell was taken down and Debby stays in the same place yet; and I rather think, next month she'll be married in Squire Smith's best parlor.

The reason we have "helps" and no "servants" in the country is, that nearly all the girls who live out, get into service pretty much as Kitty Clark got into our family. Kitty and Fanny and I went to school together, and it was more than an even chance once that I should pay attention to her. She is as well born as either of us—as well bred, and as well educated, and if I wanted a flame now, I would as soon look to her as any body in Jonesville. A year ago last Summer, her father, who was richer than mine then, concluded to sell out, and move to the Western country. So Kitty waited here in Jonesville, and Mr. Clark started off, to find his new home. I reckon he cheated the general post office a little, if he is a deacon in Parson Williams's church. "Kitty," says he, "postage is high, and writing letters is troublesome. Newspapers go cheap, but writing on 'em is agin the law. I reckon though, if you were to get a paper from a place you knew that nobody lived in, that you know, you might judge that I was there and well." Kitty reckoned she could, and off her father started.

Pretty soon newspapers began to come to Kitty. The postmaster at our place always took them out of the wrapper, for he knew how might a calculating man Clark was, and was jealous that he was cheating the post office. He looked them through and through, and held them up to the light, and looked under the printed words to see if any were dotted or marked, so as to make the words printed for something else, spell out a letter. But he never caught Deacon Clark tripping, I can tell you.

All the time, in half an hour after Fanny got a paper, the postmaster would keep a hearing "Deacon Clark got to such a place, such a day, and was well," and he couldn't make it out how that was done, for he knew no letters came. At last he spe and asked Kitty how she knew. "Does your father write on papers?" says he. "No," says Kitty, "but the postmasters put their stamps and dates on." Old Gultridge, our P. M., saw that Deacon Clark was making the postmasters clear the revenue themselves, and he up and tarred Kitty shouldn't have the wrappers. She complained to me, I told Squire Smith, and he went over and told Guttridge that he must give the wrappers up. So the thing became town talk, and the way we young fellows plagued the old postmaster almost teased his life out. This lasted about a month—and then the newspapers stopped coming. You may well judge that this made some anxious minds in Jonesville besides poor Kitty, for although we told her any thing and every thing to keep up her spirits, we had to allow, when we talked it over, and she wasn't by, that it was rather a gloomy sign. The poor child began to droop, and in less than a week you could see that she was already looking paler and thinner.

A clergyman in the country has a great many troubling and melancholy duties to do; and his minions are so various and once in a while so unexpected, that it isn't strange that the very boys learn to look on his benevolent face as having almost a prophet's meaning, and on his very coat with reverence. Old folks too, will connect a dying bed, or a wedding, or a funeral, with every step the minister takes. Who can wonder!

One afternoon a year ago last September, Kitty called at our house to ask me again, "what I thought." Fanny Arbuckle was along too. Kitty was staying at that time at a house over the road from ours, and a little piece farther up, but not so far that you couldn't see the house from where we live. The girls sat down a minute, without taking off their things, with their backs to the window. I said all I could to poor Kitty, but I couldn't say any thing that I hadn't said before, and I couldn't say any thing to do any good. At last, to kind of keep off Kitty's trouble, I told them we'd take a walk.

Well, I stood up to the glass to fix my neck-handkerchief a little, for I'd been hard to work, and it was awry. My eye happened accidentally to fall on the gate of the yard before the house where Kitty stopped. I saw Parson Williams putting up his hand to the latch as slow and secretful as if he was afraid it would pull the fence down to touch it.

"Gracious! Zekiel! what ails you!" said Fanny, "see you trying to twist your neck off!"

I guess I was a little nervous. I saw Mr. Williams go up to the door and a woman come out. He said something, and it seemed to me as if I could hear him speak, so plain as day, and ask if Kitty was at home. Then two or three words more ensued to pass, and the woman sprung back into the house, and the dog, good, kind old minister turned round, and began to walk toward our door. I pretended to be terribly busy with my neck and hair, but I felt all the time, the faintness coming up in my throat. Then I saw the woman just pull her apron over her head, and follow Mr. Williams. Then the children come running out of the house, and shot wildly about, like a parcel of chickens when a hawk has swept down and taken one of the brood. Then a man came to the door, as if he had left the tea-table, and stood and looked up and down the road. Another man passing stopped, and they talked fast and earnest. Then the woman who was on the way to our house said a hurried word to another woman she met, and she turned and came with her. Then they both spake to a man who was passing, and he left them and went right up to another, and they talked—and all of them looked right at our house, with all their eyes. All this passed in less than a minute, though it seemed an hour to me. Just as the girls turned their heads to see what I could be staring at, I heard Parson Williams's measured step in the entry. In another minute the room was full—father and mother, and all the neighbors. Oh but ill news does fly space!

A newspaper had come to town with an account of a terrible steamboat explosion off West, and the name of a Mr. Clark, from the East, was among the passengers, and the owner of it had not been found, alive or dead. Of course the minister was called upon to break the dreadful news to his poor daughter; as from the absence of her father, and the fact that no letter came, and no more papers from him, it was concluded at once that he must be dead.

When Kitty first saw Mr. Williams, she looked like to faint—but in an instant more, she threw her head up erect, and her eyes, distended and glassy, rolled from person to person. Her bonnet had fallen back, and Mr. Williams, who really seemed weaker than Kitty, kind of rested on me with one arm for support, and placed his right hand upon Kitty's head. His shrivelled and freckled thin fingers as they trembled with agitation among her bright auburn hair, seemed to mock the unnatural composure of her blanched features, while her eyes still rolled in vacuity.

"My daughter"—the good old man tremblingly began—but his tears choked him. The evening wind threw a lock of her hair across his hand, and he groaned, shuddered, and drew the hand suddenly back, as if a corpse had startled him by showing signs of life.

"Taint of no use!" cried Aunt Sally, "she can't hear a word you say." The ever-ready hartshorn was produced, and fortunately a portion of its pungency entered her eyes. Tears came, the minister seated himself by her side without a word, and she clung to his breast and wept. And in silence we all wept too, for many moments. Then he placed her on her knees with gentle force—and knelt beside her. Those outside the house—for quite a congregation had collected—took off their hats, bowed, and the reverend pastor devoutly besought the throne of grace for comfort to the afflicted.

Kitty was down sick for many days. She has not slept a night out of my father's house since that day—and I want to know, Trollope or no Trollope, Dickens, Hall, Fiddler and Hamilton to boot, if we ought to call such a help as she is a servant!

And now I'm coming to my story—for I hasn't begun as tell it yet. After that hour Kitty never seemed like the same girl, and though a man could has occasionally visited her face, it has been like an accidental peep of sunlight on a winter's day. Last year of a Christmas we couldn't be boisterous, we didn't want to, and we didn't feel like it. This year, father, and mother, and aunt Sally, and Fanny and I have all tried to make her enjoy the prospect of the coming holidays, and the dear good girl tries her best to cheer up so as not to damp all the rest of us. But every kindness that father showed her, and he's full of it, only seemed to remind her of the own father that she has lost, and she would steal away by herself to cry at the remembrance.

Mother succeeded no better with her, and so to Aunt Sally, she's just one of Job's comforters—if there ever was one. "Now Kitty," she says, if the your girl happens to be silent a moment, "you shouldn't be thinking of your loss all the time, but recollect how much better off you are now, than thousands and thousands." Like as not the poor girl wouldn't be thinking of her father till Aunt Sally brought him up, and all she could do would be to slump into tears away, while her eyes filled.

Last Thursday night, we were all talking over our holiday presents that are, and that are to be. All were full of life and chat, and all were allotting upon a happy Christmas and New Year's, except Kitty; but even her eye seemed once in a while to light in sympathy with the joy around her. Then again a shade would pass over her face, as if he in whom her tender years had trusted for support, could never be forgotten.

We were all struck up by the entrance of Parson Williams. What could have brought him out in the night? The infirm old man hardly ever leaves his house after dark. We looked at his face as hard as we dared, and certainly quite as hard as was civil. This errand was certainly not one of grief.

"Have you read the President's Message?" he said to father, while his lips seemed to be playing with him, in the words they uttered.

"What upon airth," muttered Aunt Sally to herself, over her knitting.

"Well—yes—partly," answered my father, evidently as much astonished as Aunt Sally to hear the parson preach politics; and the minister sat and looked in the fire. He moved his feet—as if he wanted to dance—he lifted his hands suddenly as if to snap his fingers—he jumped up and run to poor Kitty, who sat amazed at his curious actions. He took her hand and stared her in the face—strained her to his bosom—and performed divers other antics to the undisguised amazement of us all. Aunt Sally would have stuck her nose in Lin mouth to smell his breath if she had dared. "Do you want a Christmas gift?" at length he said to Kitty.

The frightened child thanked and told him "no, sir."

"Yes, you do! you do! you do!" said the old gentleman, now fairly dancing about the room. "and I've brought it to you. I see him at the window—and I've brought the CHRISTMAS GIFT. It's a letter from your father, and I was told to break it gently to you."

We thought the good man mad; but her father did, in another moment, clasp his child in his arms. Now, ahem! we have a merry Christmas! Aye, and a grateful one too, to the Giver of all Good. "Joy seldom kills," or Kitty would have died.

Mr. Williams had been instructed to tell an innocent lie, that he had a letter, by way of introducing the good news; but the old gentleman was awkward at dissimulation. The restoration of the father as one from the dead, has no miracle in it. He escaped the explosion with others; but finding that the account of his death had certainly gone to his daughter in the newspapers, he feared to surprise her with the contradiction, until he could entrust her preparation for so glad a surprise to good hands. But Parson Williams has gained more credit for kindness of heart than for discretion in his share of this business.

Jonesville, Dec. 17, 1842.

Brevities.

PERFECT SENTIMENT.—"The memories of childhood, the long far away days of boyhood, the mother's love and prayer, the voice of a departed play-fellow, the ancient church and school-house, all with their green and hallowed association, come upon the heart in the dark hour of sin and sorrow, as well as in the joyous time, like the passage of a pleasantly remembered dream, and casts a ray of their own hallowed purity and sweetness over them."

LIFE AND REPUTATION.—The two most precious things on this side of the grave are reputation and life; but it is to be lamented that the most contemptible whisper may deprive us of the one, and the weakest weapon may take from us the other.

GOOD AIM.—Aim at perfection in everything. They who aim at it, and persevere, will come much nearer to it than those whose lessons and despondency make them give it up as unattainable.

THE BELFRY OF BRUGES.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

In the market-place of Bruges stands the Belfry old and brown,
Three consumed and three re-builded, still it watches o'er the town;
As the summer morn was breaking on that lofty tower I stood,
And the world threw off the darkness, like the weeds of widow-hood.

Thick with towns and hamlets studded, and with streams and vapors gray
Like a shield embossed with silver, round and red wert the landscape lay.
At my feet the city slumbered. From its chimneys here and there
Wreaths of snow-white smoke ascending, vanished ghost-like into air.

Not a sound rose from the city at that early morning hour,
But I heard a heart of iron beating in that ancient tower.
From their nests beneath its rafters sang the swallows wild and high;
And the world beneath me sleeping seemed more distant than the sky.

Then most musical and solemn, bringing back the olden times
With their strange, unearthly changes, rang the melancholy chimes,
Like the perfume from some old cloister, when the nuns are sing in the choir,
And the great bell tolled among them, like the chanting of a dire.

Visions of the days departed, shadowy phantoms filled my brain;
They who live in history only seemed to walk the earth
All the Foresters of Flanders, mighty Baldwin Bras-de-Fer, Lyderick du Buck, and Cracy, Philip, Guy de Dampierre!

I beheld the pageants splendid, that adorned those days of old;
Stately dames, like queens attended, knights who bore the Fleece of Gold,
Lombard and Venetian merchants with deep-laden argosies,
Ministers from twenty nations—more than royal pomp and ease.

I beheld proud Maximilian, kneeling humbly on the ground;
I beheld the gentle Mary, hunting with her hawk and hound,
And her lighted bridal chamber, where a duke slept with the queen,
And the sound of revelry and music around them, and a sound unseated between.

I beheld the Flemish weavers, with the brave Count of Nevers,
Marching hence to Ghent and Bruges, from the Battle of the Spurs;
Saw the fight at Minnewater, saw the White Hoods stay great Artevelde, victorious, scale the Golden Dragon's nest.*

And again the whisker'd Spaniard all the land with terror vaunts,
And again the wild alarum sounded from the tocsin's tongue;
Till the bell of Ghent responded, over lagoon and dike of sand,
"I am Roland! I am Roland! there is victory in the land!"

Then the phantoms I had summoned back into their grave once more,
Hours had passed away like minutes, and before I was aware,
Lo, the shadow of the Belfry counted the sun-illumined square.

* The Golden Dragon, taken from the Church of St Sophia in Constantinople in one of the Crusades, and placed on the Belfry of Bruges, was afterward transported to Ghent by Philip Van Artevelde, and still adorns the Belfry of that city.

THE COQUETTE; Or the Game of Life.

BY MRS. FRANCES SARGENT OSGOOD.

CHAPTER I.

The brilliantly lighted saloon in which Mr. Clifford's company were assembled was suddenly darkened. At the same moment the curtain rose, and displayed to expectant eyes the first "tableau vivant." It was singularly beautiful. A dark, fierce-looking slave-dealer stood behind a Persian girl, from whose graceful form and face he had just unbound the veil, thereby revealing to the gaze of a voluptuous looking Turk, seated on a pile of cushions, so rare a galaxy of charms, that not only his eyes, but those of all the spectators, were riveted upon her. The shrinking modesty of her attitude, as she stood with her drooping hands locked languidly and meekly before her, was exquisitely graceful—her dark blue eyes were "darkly, deeply blue," and auburn waves of gemmed and braided hair" fell glistening over her rounded form, in its becoming vest of scarlet cashmere, down to the slippered feet, which, as they peeped out beneath the full white satin pantaloons, in slipers gorgeous with jewels and embroidery.

For a moment the lovely vision glittered, and was gone—for the curtain fell upon the chiding tableau which represented Retzsch's thrilling picture, called "The Game of Life." A youth with Satan playing at chess—his stake, a soul! The guardian spirit of the latter is seen at his side, with half averted face, gazing in mingled sorrow and compassion on the game, which he has almost lost. And in that white robed angel, the beautiful form and features of the Persian girl again appeared, so touchingly lovely, so pure and spiritual, that the gazers held their breath in rapture.

"Tell me—tell me her name!" exclaimed a young artist, as the curtain fell.

"It is Lillian Clifford, the daughter of our host—" was the answer.

"But whom is Fanny?" said another.

"Oh! she is cousin to her little brother, I suppose. He is an invalid, you know, and she is devoted to him. But we shall see her by and by, for her mother insists upon her appearing at the ball, though she could not pretende her to take part in the tableaux. But hark! I hear the band—let us join the dancers."

A fairy hall followed the tableaux, and as the crowd stood near the door, watching for the entrance of the angel, a young and blooming girl, in the ancient dress of a French marquise, glided by him, and with a low and playful courtesy to Mr. Clifford, took her station by her side, whence she was immediately led to the dance by the Lucifer of the tableau. Could it be Lilian? The transformation was so complete, that he could hardly believe his eyes. The beautiful hair powdered—drawn back from the brow, and raised to an enormous height—tiny black patches here and there setting off her exquisite complexion—the dark stiff brocade looped up over white satin—the monstrous fan—the dainty French heped out at intervals of the quadrille—the stately, graceful minuet motions—all, all was perfect!

"What a study!" murmured the fascinated artist, who, by the way, looked very picturesque himself, as he stood leaning against a pillar, in a Spanish costume, worthy of Murillo.

"My guardian angel!" whispered the youth who had been Lucifer's antagonist in the tableau, and who now appeared in the garb of a sailor, "will you not dance the next quadrille with me? I need your protection more than ever, amid the temptations of such a scene as this."

"Je toujours veille sur lui!" replied the lady, with an eloquent smile, and a bow of assent. Lucifer scowled malignantly, and muttered in the sailor's ear—

"Lilian Delancy, you will lose the game!"

The young man's eye flashed fire as he answered,

"You are a skillful player, Burton, but I, for one, defy your arts!"

A slight sneer was the reply, but Delancy passed on without designing further notice of his rival. At the same time, a modest looking, dark-eyed girl, in the simple dress of a quaker, approached and whispered—

"Lilly, dear, I wish you could come to the nursery for a moment, after this dance; Willie wants to see your dress."

"Nonsense, Fanny, I can't leave till the ball is over. Willie must wait—!"

"But he will be asleep then, Lilly!"

"Well, well, I can't help it if he is!" and with a bewitching smile, and the grace of a Hebe, she turned her partner in the dance.

Fanny sighed, and the artist sighed too, and soon after begged an introduction, not to the coquettish marquise, but to the timid quaker girl.

"Who is that noble-looking being with my sister?" suddenly exclaimed Lilian Clifford to a friend, struck for the first time, by his manly form, and dark, but beautifully chiselled face, lighted up by a pair of brilliant Byron eyes, and a mouth full of expression.

"That! Why, Frank Russell, the artist, to be sure. Don't you know—he has just returned from Italy. What do you think of him?"

"Think of him! He looks like a man—and that is more than you can say of any one else in the room. Look at that attitude! and then his voice!—hark! did you ever listen to such tones—so rich—so deep! I should like to hear him read poetry—and his manner, too—there is a calm and gentle dignity about it, which makes one involuntarily look up to him as to a superior being. I must go and speak to Fanny." And tripping up to her sister, she tapped her cheek with her fan, exclaiming, "A penny for your thought, Fanny. How abstracted you look!"

"A thousand pulteras for the thought, Miss Clifford," said Russell, in a low tone, and with an earnest gallantry, which well became his chivalrous beauty and bearing.

"Tell him you will give your thought for his," whispered Lilian, playfully, "for he too was in a reverie."

"Nay, I would give an age's thought of mine, for one moment's of yours, and rejoice in the exchange," murmured Russell, with a smile, still bending his dark eyes upon Fanny's drooping lids.

"Come, Fanny, you shall tell it now," continued her sister.

"I cannot—don't ask me, Lilian," faltered Fanny, while a deep blush stole in her pure, pale cheek.

"Well, at least have the sense to introduce me to your new beau—can't you?" whispered Lilian, pettishly.

The introduction took place, and the graceful coquette tried all her sportive and beguiling wiles, without any apparent effect upon the heart of the handsome stranger.

While thus engaged, Delancy claimed her hand for the dance.

"Oh! Julian—you will excuse me, I know, and dance with Fanny this time, for dear little Willie has sent for me. I will be back soon. Mr. Russell, may I trouble you for a seat through this round?"

"That's right, dear Lily, I am so glad," cried Fanny, her sweet face beaming with joy, at her sister's supposed kindness to the little invalid.

"You see Willie's guardian angel, too, then, Lilian," said Delancy, with a look of admiring affection.

The artist sighed again—but gave his arm to the lady, and accompanied her to the foot of the stairs. On their way she contrived to tell a dozen different people where she was going.

"Wait for me here a few minutes, Mr. Russell—I shall take more than one round, I know," she flitted up the stairs, and vanished from his gaze, like a dream of light.

The artist leant against the balustres, and lost himself in thought—how long he knew not; but he was awakened by a low melodious laugh at his side, and starting, he found the soft hand of Lilian Clifford on his arm, and her lovely eyes raised smilingly to his.

"Is it your pleasure, noble dose, that we resume the tableau? I have had my scan in yours for some three minutes, patiently awaiting your movements."

Russell colored, as he asked forgiveness, and unable to resist the witchery of her every word and look, abandoned himself to her influence during the rest of the evening.

CHAPTER II.

Luxurious as a lady's boudoir, was the studio in which Frank Russell was seated, three weeks after the ball at Mrs. Clifford's. Lounges, ottomans, damask drapery, mirrors, paintings, statues and books, were all arranged with a graceful and careless elegance, which told of the artist throughout—he who is himself, in his rich crimson tunic, his dark hair waving beneath an embroidered velvet cap, completed the beauty of the picture.

Before him, on his easel, was the half length of a girl in a Spanish costume. She was looking over her shoulder, with an arch smile—the tip of a superb fan, which she held, was pressed to her dimpled chin, and a black lace mantilla, thrown back on her head, fell over her snowy shoulder to her waist; while clusters of soft dark hair mingled their golden glow with its shade, and enforced the brilliant beauty of a face radiant with youth, love, and happiness.

"My queen, to the life!" he murmured the artist, as he gazed at his own exquisite creation, "I am sure she loves me—just so she looked last night, when I begged her to grant me an interview this evening. She guessed my purpose, and her whole soul was in her eyes, as she looked her reply. But I must touch that arm once more—it is hardly round enough yet."

He passed behind a marble pedestal, on which was a statue of Love, to a table, where lay his pallets and brushes. Eve he reappeared, a party of ladies and gentlemen entered the room.

"Lilian Clifford, it is you to perfection!" exclaimed one of the former.

"Is it a likeness of the laughing elf?"

"A likeness! No! by heaven—'tis she herself!" exclaimed a gentleman of the party, and then the cold, sneering voice of Burton, the tableau Lucifer, was heard—

"But where is your artist lover, Miss Clifford! We thought to find him at his devotions, before your portrait. Report declares the siftings to be not 'like Raphael's visits,' but most unreasonably prolonged."

Frank waited to hear her indignant reply to this insinuation. How was he confounded by what followed.

"Nay, Burton, report can hardly accuse me of so preposterous a purpose, as that of encouraging a nameless artist."

"It accuses you of encouraging a nameless poet, is well."

"You refer to Julian Delancy. Be assured, sir, that they themselves know me better."

The statue fell with a crash at her feet, and the artist confronted her with folded arms, and flashing eyes.

"Thank God, madam, I do know you, or it is too late!" and bowing haughtily, he left the room.

Lilian turned pale, but forced a laugh, and began to criticise the picture.

Fanny chatted on alone that evening by the fireside, when Mr. Russell was announced.

"I have come to thank you for your kindness during my sojourn here, my dear Miss Clifford, and to bid you 'good bye.'"

Fanny started, but by a brave effort restrained her emotion, and said, in a low tone—

"Are you to be long absent?"

"Only a year or two!"

Only a year or two! Fortunately for Fanny, at that moment the door opened, and Lilian, attired for a ball, and radiant in beauty, entered. She colored, when she saw her lover—her eyes filled with tears, and scarcely faltered, she caught both his hands.

"Frank! dear Frank! forgive me!"

Lilian Clifford, you little know the heart your rapture of that moment. But the light, the glow died away, as suddenly as it came. She thought of Lilian, and though she blamed her coquetry and folly, she pitied her disappointment. With one glorious effort she repressed her tears—the sighs, that struggled for liberty, and replied in a low, but clear voice,

"Mr. Russell, I can never be your wife!"

Struck by her calm, decided tone, he stood for a moment gazing at her in despair; but that gaze called to her cheek a blush as speaking, that hope revived, and with all the glowing eloquence of which he was master, he besought her to retract her resolution. Overcome by his passionate entreaties, Fanny could only falter, half unconsciously, in reply—

"But Lilian—"

"Lilian has wronged me—but that light dream is over. Do not, oh! do not disappoint me in one far dearer and holier love."

Poor Fanny! it was a moment of strange trial, but her heart was strong. She raised her clear, sad eyes to his, and again replied—

"Russell, I can never be your wife!"

He dropped her hand. With a slow but unfaltering step she passed from the room—reached home—locked herself into her chamber, and for once giving way to the full tide of her emotions, wept for hours unceasingly. Her tears relieved her, and after a fervent prayer to heaven for strength, she was able to resume her occupations, with a subdued and self approving heart.

"Mr. Russell, you have grown very stupid of late, do read me something," said Lilian, one evening, as they sat with a few friends in the library.

"And what?" said Frank.

"Oh! there is a new, fresh, recent volume of poems by Tennyson on the table. Isn't that delightful?"

"But I shall want a paper knife."

"That you shall have, and keep it, too, as a reward for your trouble,—and oh! congratulate me! I have just had an idea!—while you are cutting the leaves, I will scribble it down. Lend me your pencil, Frank!" And ere he had divided half a dozen leaves, she had traced in fairy characters the following lines:

Ah! had I power, I'd chosen my gift
To be a magic treasure;
For it should never part a page
That should not give you pleasure!

"That should not give you pleasure!

Rolling the paper in as small a compass as possible, she screwed it into the top of the pencil-case and returned it to him with a grace so bewitching, that his old dream began to disturb him again. He hurriedly turned over the leaves of the book and smiled half in bitterness, as a few lines caught his glance and told upon his heart.

Fixing his eyes earnestly upon Lilian's face, he said in a deep meaning tone, "I have found a poem which I think you will appreciate. Shall I read it?"

The poem was that strangely moving one called "Clara Vere de Vere," and his low, rich, manly, but melancholy voice thrilled to her very soul as he proceeded:

The second verse commences as follows:

Lady Clara Vere de Vere,
I know you proud to bear your name:
Your pride is yet no mate for mine,
Too proud to care from whence I came.

These lines, and those which follow, called the fire into Lilian's eyes and cheeks; but she tossed back her graceful head with a proud and careless smile.

Lady Clara Vere de Vere,
Some merker pupil you must find;
For were you queen of all that is,
I could not stoop to such a mind.

But when he came to the words—

Not thrice your branching limes have flown
Since I looked young Lawrence dead.

Oh! your sweet eyes, your low replies,
A great enchantress you may be;
But there was that across his throat
Which you had hardly cared to see.

Poor Lilian struggled for a moment as if suffocating, and then fell at his feet insensible.

Fanny sprung forward to raise her, exclaiming, "Oh, Frank! why did you read that verse! You surely could not have heard—"

"What—what—Fanny!" he cried, as he hung over the lovely, lifeless form of her whom he now felt to be dearer to him than ever.

Too soon, he heard the truth! Too soon! The lady for his revived affection. Julian Delancy, who, as the reader already knows, was passionately devoted to Lilian, had been, during Frank's last visit in Italy, alternately petted and scorned as the caprichious of his rich rival Burton had varied from cold to warm; until at length the growing empressment of the latter's manner had decided her to dismiss, at once and forever, the unfortunate and interesting victim of her coquetry. This very day his lifeless body was borne home to a widowed mother.

"And there was that across his throat
Which Lilian had not cared to see."

The same paper which announced this tragic event, also announced the elopement of the Lucifer of my tale, with the wife of his most intimate friend. Lilian recovered from her fainting fit to find her artist lover bending over her with a gaze in which his whole soul spoke to her; but the instant he met her eye he turned away, determined never again to betray his feelings to her scorn. Still he visited the house from time to time, and was often allured to the very verge of a declaration by her bewildering beauty and the childish, planning, playful coquetries of her manner.

One day he took up a book, in a blank page of which she had been scribbling some lines. When she saw him turn to them, she sprung up with a bright blush, and sportively placed her little hand over the words. I suppose I need not describe the temptation, he pressed his lips to it involuntarily.

She immediately withdrew it, but leaned over his shoulder as he read—

My heart is on a dangerous sea,
A wintry sky shows it,
And lo one made the helm for me.
And no one seems to love it.

Oh! would that in a kinder world,
Ere storms in fast must shiver,
Oh! would to God its sails were furl'd
Forever and forever!

Touched by the sad sentiment, he looked up in her face. Her eyes, filled with tears, were bent upon him, and her hand trembled as he took it. "Are the verses yours, Lilian?"

"Oh, Frank! I should not have let you read them!"

He was thrown off his his guard.

"They are yours, then! And I—may not I—mind the helm!" "Dear Lilian! say that I may."

She hid her open upon his shoulder. Her soft hair touched his face. He lost his cheek to it—their lips met—they were sealed. The next moment she raised that beautiful face, bathed in blushes and smiles, and clasping her hands with a covert, low ringing laugh, exclaimed in the words of one of our finest poets—

"Nay, hetamme, for a hundred lives.
Oh! were the lark right!"

He caught her to his heart.

Ah, Frank! you little know what a frail, light thing you have undertaken to guide. Be happy while you may.

CHAPTER IV.

A twelvemonth after the wedding—a charming cottage in Brooklyn—Lilian, Frank and Fanny in the master's boudoir. A beautiful infant lying on the rich cushions of the couch. There is a light cloud on the noble brow of the artist,—he has been looking over a million's bill! His young wife looks listless and weary.

"Will you lend me your pencil, Frank!" said Fanny. He handed it to her; there was no lead in it. She unscrewed the top—and out fell the little roll of paper, placed there long ago by Lilian.

"May I read it, Frank?"

"Certainly, dear."

She read it—started—changed color; but without further sign of emotion, quietly returned it to the pencil-case. Lilian looked imploringly at her, and Fanny rose to leave the room. Frank saw it all.

"Stay, Fanny; did you compose those lines?" Fanny was silent—she trembled like a leaf. Russell continued, "I saw in your scrap-book, the other day, signed by your name, a copy of some verses which Lilian gave me on the day of our engagement. Were they ours. Are they yours or hers?"

Fanny shrunk back; but he insisted, and she took she paper—read the first line—

"My bark is on a dangerous sea," and burst into tears. He stood before her pale, but resolute.

"Speak, Fanny, I implore you, are they yours?"

She hesitated; but she could not lie. She looked at Lilian and flew to her side.

"Oh, Frank! she is fainting; come to her quick!"

"Let her cause to herself; she has deceived me. Let her forgive herself, if she can!"

The strangeness of his tone aroused her.

She rose, and tottering toward him, threw herself in tears at his feet. "Oh, Frank! do not look at me so! They are Fanny's lines; but it was to win your love that I deceived you! Will you see your Lilian ruling and not forgive her?" Who could resist those eyes—those sweet, imploring tones—that almost angel loveliness. Frank could not. She was forgiven, and the game of life went on.

OUR WEEKLY CHAT.

The paucity of news in this day's paper, will be found in the details of the conspiracy to take an United States vessel from her officers, and convert her into a pirated cruiser. The consequences of such a daring act, had it been consummated, it is unnecessary so painful to contemplate. Of the conduct of the officers of the Somers, in the suppression of the mutiny, we have elsewhere said all that we think it proper to say, while the facts are as yet not officially before the public. In due time, all the circumstances of this fearful tragedy will be presented in matters of legal investigation and of record. It is not an unprecedented affair, although our young navy has no other similar passage in its history. At least one event like it has occurred on board of a British vessel, even to the parallel circumstance that an officer was concerned; and in that case, as in this, the safety of the vessel demanded instant and summary punishment of the ringleaders.

There are considerations incidental to this event which it is hoped may, yet, be pressed upon the public attention. One of them is the authoritative fact that too many parents and guardians, ever since young was ploughed by keels, have considered a vessel the fit penitentiary to which to send ungovernable and mischievous boys who cannot be curbed at home. It is an affliction, both of the naval and of the merchant service, that bad and apparently irreclaimable youth are absolutely unacknowledged good enough for sailors. Now although the discipline of any ship is often sufficient to reclaim those who are not too thoroughly vile, it is probably the fact that the great majority of pirates and mutineers are of the class who, being driven to sea because too bad to live on shore, ultimately prove themselves too bad to live at sea also. And as the larger portion of our hardy seamen are men who have taken to the sea from choice, or from circumstances of chance, or of necessity, not allied to any moral obliquity, it is a grievous wrong to force upon them the companionship of villains and desperadoes—output, though the association only were considered, deeply criminal—when such consequences result as piracy and murder.

Another matter—and one which deserves the immediate attention of Congress—is the correction of the ridiculous mistake into which our legislators fell, when they dismantled our men of war, by abolishing the marine corps, or so unfolding it, that its great practical benefits are lost. All maritime experience has demonstrated the utility and necessity of marines, or as they may more intelligibly be described, soldiers at sea. There can be no kindred or affinity between soldiers and sailors. No mutiny was ever hatched, in which marines and sailors proper united. Jack views pipe-clay with such supreme aversion, that the marines are forced into a distinct position, and are always found faithful to the officers; or if they become by any chance disaffected, their ill-humor is not dangerous. They are too limited in number, of themselves to effect any thing, and never can find sailors to co-operate with them.

The Congressional record will show what Congress has done and attempted since our last. It is too early in the session to exhibit much in the way of results; but in the absence, so far, of any topic of dissonance leading to long speeches, the preliminaries of the session have been disposed of with commendable expedition. From the temper of both houses it would seem tolerably certain that the Bankrupt Law will be this session repealed; and a conversion of this probability appears to have urged those who intend to avail themselves of the act, into exceeding great activity in the principal cities.

Our selected department exhibits choice selections from three of the leading magazines in the country; and we may point to each article in prose and in verse, as to specimens of periodical writing, which would do no discredit to any magazine in the world. In whatever light our transatlantic friends may affect to regard our annuals and warbles, they must concede that the belles-lettres mouthfine of the United States need fear comparison with no foreign rivals.

In the original department we throw articles "appropriate for the season" in the intention of the writers, if in nothing else. One of them Hatcher lands upon the theme which should fire every Christian's heart; and he is followed by a new correspondent, who would seem to have fallen by chance precisely upon the point of commencement, which was Hatcher's closing period. Ezekiel Jones dilates, in prose, upon the way in which they do things at this season in the country. We are almost inclined to envy Mr. Jones, the happiness upon which he prides himself, and we certainly do wish his friend, Kitty Clark, all joy of her Christmas Gift.

Taking the "cream of the Magazines" fresh, as it rises, and publishing the articles pertinent to the season to which we have referred, has crowded a highly interesting Lecture on the French Revolution over for one week. The same cause also leads to so small a dish of "Our Maud" as is this day presented. But, having the whole now in our hands, we shall deliver it hereafter, as fast as possible, that the impatience of our friends to "come to Hecuba," may be humored. Jack Hinton is certainly one of the most musical gentlemen we have ever encountered.

CHRISTMAS!

Various rumors have reached the city, relative to the approach of the ubiquitous Kris-Kringle—who is known in New Amsterdam under the alias of Santaclaus. One of our country friends alleges that the old gentleman was detected in stealing a load of sweet turkies in Berks county, but as Kris prefers rather to delectate the younger youth of a family with confections, and to leave the solids to be bought in market, this rumor is doubtful. The alliterative allegation that he was last seen peeling over the Alleghanies with a barrel of treacle, to be done into Taffy and elaborated into more artificial teeth destroying substances, has more show of probability. And then again, the piles of books, in price from ten cents to ten dollars and over—the jewelry, haberdashery, millinery, and toy house paraphernalia, the goods and wares, the gay articles and neat, the rich and attractive, which embellish the windows in Chestnut street and in all the streets, indicate that if Kris-Kringle has really done all this importation, he, at least, suffers little from the depression of the times.

It is a good custom to visit the children with presents at this season, and furthermore, it is a delightfully pleasant one. No treat which all the days in the three hundred and sixty-five afford, is more gratifying to a man or woman with a heart, than to see the lighting up of the eyes of the little folks, when, in the morning, the hitherto carefully concealed mass are brought to the light, and placed in the hands of the eager expectants. Let them be, who prefer to apply their courtesy to older recipients. No blushing them, Master Will-not-be-bashful-if-you-can-help-it. You may buy a wife with a Christmas box; and she may be dear or cheap at that, as the fates favor you; but it is undeniable that you have faith in the investment. Kris-Kringle is a maker of some matches than St. Valentine, "by odds." A woman might be offended by the presentation of a token on the 14th of February; but that young lady is yet to be born who will take offence at a Christmas or New Years present—particularly if you should compliment her trade with the initial number of some excellent Magazine for '43, and tell her that the other numbers for the year were to follow. A present at New Years may mean something or nothing, as the parties choose; and is therefore exceedingly convenient.

And now a word or two in a more serious strain. If we are all in the spirit of Him, in whose honor this festival is established, remember the poor. The apostle speaks of two classes: "He that wateth the day regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it." Prove your sincerity by acts—your faith by works. Regarding the festival or not, remember the poor; give of your abundance to those who, in their poverty lack necessities, whose you in your competence have superfluity. But we are pursuing probably to little purpose. Those whose disposition jumps with the injunction twice placed above in italics, need no invitation to a duty which they have already remembered, while those whose hearts are as hard as the nether millstone, are not to be melted even by Christmas. Pseudo-saints, however, exist throughout one, with the disposition to do good when reminded of that duty, may be moved to actions benevolence, by a word in kindness. If so, this annual Christmas injunction may not have been written in vain.

PUBLIC TASTE ABROAD.

In recent London papers appeared the report of the trial of the discarded paramour of a scion of nobility for theft. It appeared that certain articles which she carried away from his lordship's house, and obtained on pretensions, he claimed back again, as merely borrowed to her. The verdict was acquitted, but it was rendered, apparently more from contempt for the complainant than from a belief in the woman's innocence, as discarded mistresses are certainly entitled pretensions to make to abandoned women. It appears by subsequent accounts that the woman pursued these articles, as she had claim tried to get redress against the pawnbroker, who refuses to give them up, having been served with an injunction by the brazenfaced fugitive from whom they were taken. And, from her confidence to redeem the articles, it would seem also that there is among the London aristocracy of wealth, fashion and title, yet another man, lower if possible, than the parents who has appeared in the criminal courts as the prosecutor of Alice Lowe, and is also a claimant against her by civil process; not apparently, being content, with the notoriety which the first proceedings obtained for him. One is forcibly reminded, by these relations, of the burglar who appealed to a jurist to compel a fellow robber to surrender his share of the booty they had taken. The only difference is that the burglars were infinitely more reputable than the parties in these suits.

As the women rode to the purse-brokers in a magnificent chariot, it appears, as we have already observed, that some other wealthy despicable has become her "protector." A sorry argument this for the condition of morals among a certain portion of the proud and wealthy of the father land. No one would deem them publicly to lack the good and great, if he had not quite a world of his own history to keep him in countenance; and no clique in any class of society would dare to support one of their number in such open outrage upon decency, if public opinion were not altogether too lax upon such subjects. It is painful to think that in all countries, and in all ages of the world, gilded vice too often escapes its deserts; but we cannot help hugging foreign travellers, and particularly English tourists in this country to recollect these incidents. We can say, and truly, that in no American city could such events transpire, and the actors in them remain within the pale of decent society. But what is quite as bad as anything we have yet alluded to, is to come.

This shameless woman has been made a "star" of, at one of the Metropolitan theatres. Her prodigate notoriety has, more than once, filled "The City of London Theatre." To be sure this is a minor house, but that fact only operates to show that every grade of society in London has its appetite for the base and vile. We do not claim purity, by any means, for our American cities, but we do believe that a more decent outrage than the mere filling of the house would have occurred, had this experiment of a theatrical manager been tried upon an American public. We doubt not that the House would have been filled, from pit to dome, on the "first representation," but we doubt whether the same house would answer for a repetition of the performance, without undergoing extensive repairs. And we doubt, also, whether the "particular star" of the occasion would, with all her daring immodesty venture upon a second exhibition.

To what a state must the theatre have fallen, when such attractions as this are resorted to, to fill its benches! To what a state of apathy in relation to decency must that city have sank, in which a matter like this quietly takes its place, among the recognized "amusements of the people;" and what a high tone Mr. Dickens's high toned European journals must have given to the popular taste! Verily are we bound to be content with the melancholy dearth of amusements in America which Mr. Dickens commends upon to his notice. If, as he maintains, the very street grinders in our streets harmonize the Irish jig down to mournful merry melings, and their attendant monkeys become solemn and sobersided—certainly the debased and abandoned do not play such fantastic tricks with the public patience, as the manager of the City of London Theatre has done by aid of his fair and frail assistant.

THE RIGHT VIEW.

The Grand Jury at New Orleans, in a recent presentment, after saying that the law there against duelling, in consequence of its severity, is a dead letter, adds: Let the penalties be confined to a fine and imprisonment, and to the support of the family of the deceased, and in case of the relations of the deceased should not be in a situation to require said support, let the creditors have a right of action against the surviving party, and jurors will be found to enforce the law." It is a fact not as well known as it should be, that the laws against duelling are much more severe in many of the States at the South than generally at the North. Their severity defeats their usefulness.

At the South and West, the duellist is compelled by public opinion, to make apology to the public. Mr. Marshall, in a late speech in Kentucky, found it necessary to enumerate his catalogue of the causes which induced his duel with Col. Webb, and to give his own version of the affair. He adds: "If, under all these circumstances of wanton aggression on the part of Col. Webb, I had not called him out, there is not a Presbyterian lady in my district, who would not have whipped me with her garters, in scorn and contempt, from her presence." Received as a mere figure of speech, this will do; but the gentleman indulges in some hyperbole. In Kentucky, and in no other State in the Union, or country in the world, would woman, the conservator of the peaceful doctrines of the Gospel, advocate their infringement; unless indeed, false to her trust, she would throw her religion aside, as not adapted to all occasions. Does Mr. Marshall intend to insinuate that convenient practice as the habit of the ladies of his district? If so, we should not blame them if they inflicted the castigation now, which he professes to fear would have taken place in a supposed case.

But we doubt not the ability of the Kentucky ladies to take care of themselves, while their detractor exhibits such a trembling apprehension of the visitation of a punishment, the means of administering which are supposed to be in the reach of all the ladies in the land. And while, we rejoice that the utterance of Mr. Marshall's apology to his constituents shows that the right sentiment pervades the country in relation to the custom of duelling—"more honored in the breach than the observance," we pass to some considerations upon the courage of duellists, as developed in the conduct and professions of Mr. Marshall. We pass his desire to fight on the Sabbath, prompted by a fear that he might be suspected of some reverence for religion—instantly and impious and foolish as such fear was; and look at a moment at the true bathos of the narrative of this "affair of honor."

The fear, which is a duellist's courage, is confessed. Mr. Marshall poised in his mind, a shot from Col. Webb, against the weight of a silver clasp. He studied projectiles attentively, and considered that a ball, sent from a pistol, might in the first place possibly, and very probably not hit, and if it did, while it wounded the flesh, it would rather cure the wound in his vanity than rankle there. He next rummaged his memory for the accounts of encounters with slugs, as practised by the Scythians, the Assacons, and other nations of antiquity. Perhaps, also, he may have seen in his own time, a bullet grafted into the end of a cord, and used for flagellation; and in his presumed ignorance of the precise weight and formidability of the impromptu slings, in possession of the ladies of his district, which figured in his excited imagination, he chose the pistol of Col. Webb, in preference to waiting for other evils which "he knew not of." We recommend the gentleman to get married forthwith, that, when purchance hereafter, one of those terrible creatures, whose fear is in his heart, may assail him, he may possess domestic forces wherewith to meet her. Perhaps his powers of elocution with silver clasps, may diminish when he writes himself, "Benedict, the married man."

HARD TIMES.

A paper received at this office—The Phœnix, published at Hernando, De Soto county, Mississippi, comes accompanied by four or five extra sheets, which contain notices of tax collectors default sales over EIGHTEEN HUNDRED in number, all in De Soto and one or two adjoining counties. There are eighteen pages of these advertisements, five columns to a page, and the advertisements number about twenty to a column. Truly the state of that portion of the country must be depressed enough, if there is any thing in such indications or news.

But, as her been repeatedly remarked by some accomplished Lawyer—it is an ill wind which blows no where." According to the editor's published terms he must receive something like two thousand dollars for the first insertion of these advertisements, and half that sum for every subsequent appearance. Lawyers, tax-collectors, and printers of legal notices are sure of their pay, whatever may become of the holder of the property which has become escheated. Even may our country, in all its parts, recover from the last traces of the business distress which has so heavily visited it.

WAR VS. CHRISTIANITY.

Our readers may doubtless have read a speech, or extracts from it, made by an American Missionary, at one of the conferences in New York, in which the orator laid much stress upon the gain of christianity and civilization, effected by the progress of the British arms in the Eastern World. The speaker was eloquent, and his arguments were specious, but much that many of the hearers of the address, and many of the readers of it, as reported, were blinded into a half admission of the truth of premises, which, once admitted, would put Mahomedan above Christianity. If proselytism at the point of the sword is to be not only excused and pattioned, but commended after the fact, certainly that religion is the best, which, after the doctrines of the Koran, incorporates the duty of putting infidels to the sword, among its moral requirements.

It is related of the first faction of professed Christians who took up arms for their religion, that they could not evade the direct teachings of Holy Writ against proselytizing by the sword. The manner in which they justified their own conduct, and claimed to be obedient to the Gospel, while they carried on war against other Christians, affords a curious specimen of casuistry. They fought with clubs. Of course their mode of warfare was infinitely more cruel and barbarous than if they had employed legitimate weapons. It is ever thus, when men, manifestly doing wrong, claim to do right, by a distortion and misrepresentation of the right; and the war in China will prove infinitely more cruel and wicked, while it is conducted under the pretext of good, than it would be if the British nation avowed their simple and true purpose, and went directly at it, unjust as it is, in the most straightforward and open manner.

How residents upon the spot regard the question of right and wrong; and how they see the benefits which Great Britain is conferring upon China, are shown in the following letter from an American merchant residing in Canton. It appeared originally in the Boston Courier:

"In China, the British forces have made religion and civilization, in the eyes of the Chinese, synonymous with murder and rapine. Breaking in pieces monuments erected to the memory of the dead—lighting up and mutilating bodies—protecting with the ships of war, the opium smugglers on the coast—opening the way for them and for pirates to Whampoa, where a large fleet of opium craft lie, and occasionally amusing themselves with murder—and making the settlement of Hong Hong a sink, where the filth of China and Europe run together—small opium shops being open, where 'Drunk for a penny, Dead drunk for two pence,' is the motto, or at any rate, the practice. The population is English soldiers and sailors and Chinese rogues and prostitutes. Business at the north is so much interrupted by the innocent and hard working population being driven from their houses by the English cannon, that British imports have gone down to less than prime cost in England, and many of them will not be sold.

"And now the Americans have the pleasure of hearing Mr. Adams quoted as authority, which ought to make us all admit the right is with the British. If he were here, he would regret the hour when he apparently lent the sanction of his name and character to the wholesale butchery of his countrymen. When the Bogue forts were captured, the poor devils of Chinese soldiers, who were forced by their own officers to fight, finally fled and clustered together outside of the fort, on a narrow point of land, crowded upon it as far as the sea on all sides would allow, and the Indian papoys were allowed to approach within convenient distance and fire into the unresisting mass, till all the men composing it were killed or wounded."

CARPET WEAVING.

Few of our readers are aware how ingenious a machine is a carpet loom, and how curious a process is the weaving of carpets. We shall attempt to give those which are woven in figures, and not stripes. The latter require comparatively little variation from the common loom; the former in their complexity of machinery are among the most wonderful inventions of man. Still, machinery has not hitherto been so arranged as to dispense with the attendance of a large number of careful and ingenious and experienced men. The changes of colors are indicated by bells, which the loom strikes to warn the weaver, when to make his changes; and the operative sits with his pattern before him, and introduces the different colors, as directed by the tinkle of the bells. A room full of these machines, in operation, strikes the spectator with astonishment, as showing the wonderful approximation to thought and reason, with which the skill of man has contrived to invest inanimate materials. But these looms have hitherto been moved by hand alone; no steam has yet been sufficient to apply water or steam to the work.

But, as we are advised by a correspondent in Lowell, "the city of spindles," Yankee ingenuity has at last achieved a great and unexpected triumph. The power loom for common fabrics was invented in this country, all weaving, prior to the introduction of manufactures into America, having been done in hand looms. And here it may be well to state that the distress of which we have such lamentable accounts among hand loom weavers in England is one of the temporary evils which have followed this great invention. Power looms have been to a great extent introduced in England, but in an old country, where large classes, thrown out of employment, cannot readily find other occupation, there are still many hand loom weavers. In the most prosperous times, our hand loom weavers must, in their labor, compete with machinery, it is obvious that their compensation must be a mere pittance. When the demand for their work is small, and they are employed but a portion of the time, the rate of pay, which, when they have full work, barely keeps them from starvation, does not suffice to give them even a bare subsistence.

To return to our carpets. The Carpet Manufacturing Company, at Lowell have laid the foundation for a large building, which is to be filled with carpet machinery, carried entirely by water power. The looms have been tested, and found to work with entire success. With this machinery one girl will do the work formerly done by nine men. From this date we may calculate that carpets will, in a few years, be as comparatively cheap as cotton cloth, which has fallen, within the memory of living men, from thirty and forty cents the yard, to six and two.

Of the general state of manufactures in Lowell, we are advised by our correspondent, that all the works in that city are now in operation; though all of them do not yet pay a profit to the stockholders. With the revival of business generally, for which all now hope, the city will resume its wonted prosperity.

THE NAVY REPORT.

Judge Upsher, in this document, shows close attention to his duty. He recommends a suitable navy, upon some fixed and permanent plan—and that, in order to have officers properly disciplined, the vessels be kept as much as possible at sea. He also recommends the establishment of naval schools on shore, for the education of midshipmen and those who are candidates for appointments in the navy—and proposes a system of compulsory furlough, which will compel negligent or unqualified officers to retire from the navy on half pay; but thinks that the power to compel furloughs should not be given to the Secretary. To school officers and men, he recommends that the vessels on different stations should frequently change places, instead of remaining for the whole term of their cruises upon the same—an excellent suggestion.

As an encouragement to naval officers, it is recommended to establish the rank of admiral, vice-admiral and rear-admiral. This may be a desirable change.

The Secretary asks for an increase of marines, and states that a large amount of public property is now exposed to loss and depredation from insufficiency of marines to guard it. The laws to protect ship timber from destruction he deems inefficient, and rightly considers its preservation of great importance to the country. He recommends the establishment of a navy yard on the largest scale on the waters of the lower Mississippi.

He thinks that the expenses of the navy are much greater than they ought to be, and that mechanical labor is paid for at too high a price.

Great frauds have been practised in copper, which will he hereafter prevented. The stations of the different squadrons are mentioned, and the state of the service generally reviewed. The steamships Missouri and Mississippi are pronounced to be unsuited to cruising in time of peace, in consequence of their great consumption of fuel; but would be useful in time of war.

CALIFORNIA.

We last week published some rumors relative to the Oregon and California, which we are now called upon to contradict. The correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot, at Washington says that there is not the slightest truth in the rumor of an arrangement between the Mexican Government, and our Minister, in regard to California. He claims to "know from undoubted authority that Gen. Thomson has entered into no such arrangement, and that the President had no reference to it whatever in his message." Very well—then we suppose we must "give in," and lose this Californian topic, which promised to be so prolific of paragraph and discussion for the press. But when Senator Linn gets a chance to be heard on his favorite theme he will give us music, nevertheless.

NEWS FROM CHINA.

By the arrival of the Cincinnati, of Baltimore, at New York, dates are received sixteen days later from China, than the previous advices via England. We do not find in them any thing authentic of importance. There are rumors of interest, and one of them is, that a public officer of rank in Peking, professing the Christian religion, has written to some of the Roman Catholic missionaries in Macao, saying, that the capital of China has been surrounded by Tartar troops for the last two years; but that now the treasury is exhausted, their pay is long in arrear: that they are deserting by hundreds, returning home to cultivate their fields; and that if the English were to march at once on Peking, it would fall to the steps of conquerors, without a shot being fired. This statement looks exceedingly apocryphal.

The Peking Gazette (official) states, that "the bellicose barbarians have built small vessels, which enter every where among the shallows," and the Canton Register (English and now printed at Macao) states, that a clear passage to Nanking has been discovered by the river Yantzekiang. The later newsreceived by the English, at Canton, was to the effect that the British forces near Nanking, were visited by a deputation from the Imperial Commissioner, whose overtures they declined to entertain. The Hong Merchants, however, claim to have received later news, to the effect that the British force was anchored near Nanking, and that at the request of Elepoo, a truce of thirty days had been agreed to, to enable him to report to the Emperor and await his answer. The same account states that twenty of the English ships had sailed to the northward of Tientsin in the gulf of Pechelee.

The Canton Register doubts the correctness of this, but speaks about the impolicy of dishonesty, in such a tone that it betrays belief that the rumor may possibly be true. The imperial edicts have lost their confidence and swagger, and at the reports which reach him, his Celestial Majesty says, "my grief and indignation are extreme. He has gone from Peking to his summer residence. It is stated that the invaders are determined to force their way to the imperial presence itself. Should this be effected it would amount to a virtual conquest of the reigning dynasty, though the people would still be unscathed.

P. S. SPECIAL LATER.—The ship Helena arrived at New York on Wednesday, in 105 days from Canton—the shortest passage on record.

Just before she sailed, news arrived from the British force before Nankyng. The accounts, however, were not official, but the place was believed to be at their mercy, though there must have been some pretty hard fighting. Five officers are reported killed, among them two colonels, and one hundred and seventy-nine men killed and wounded; sixteen of the former are said to have dropped down dead from a coup de soleil.

The great Canal is blockaded; and after the capture of Nankyng, it is supposed the British will move on Nanj-choo-foo, and that it is the intention of the commander in chief to keep possession of the capitals of the two provinces of Chekeang and Kouanyan, the two most important positions in central China, and the occupation of which, and of the Canal, it is believed will so distress the Government at Peking, as to bring them to submission.

THE TREASURY REPORT.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January last, exclusive of the amount deposited with the trust funds and indemnities, was $630,483 68. The receipts into the Treasury during the first three quarters of the present year, were $26,616,593 78. Of this, $14,260,630 came from the customs, $1,091,638 from the public lands, $112,967 from miscellaneous sources, and the rest from Treasury notes. The receipts of the fourth quarter are estimated at about eight millions, and with the balance in the Treasury, the aggregate for the year is set down at $34,733,077.

The expenditures for the three first quarters of the year, with the estimated expenditure for the remaining quarter, amount (including $7,256,400 for redemption of Treasury notes) to $34,503,140 35, to which add the outstanding warrants, issued prior to January, 1843, $926,474 63, leaves a deficiency in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1843, of $696,536 92.

The receipts for the half year ending 30th June, 1843, are estimated (including Treasury notes and loan to amount of $5,539,000) at $14,568,113; and the expenditures for the same period (including interest on debt and Treasury notes to the amount of $605,000) at $10,381,146. The estimates of receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1844, are estimated, the receipts from customs and public lands (and $150,000 from miscellaneous sources) at $18,850,000, and the expenditures (including interest and Treasury notes) at $20,915,498.

The balance remaining in the Treasury on the 30th June, 1843, it is estimated will amount to $3,731,369, and on 30th June, 1844, to $1,525,871.

Since the estimates were prepared for the several Departments, it has been ascertained that the expenditures for the fourth quarter of the present year will fall short of the amount estimated: so that the balance in the Treasury on the 1st January next, will be larger than estimated: but, as the difference will become a charge on the Treasury in the next year, it has been deemed necessary to alter the amount as first estimated.

The recommendations of the report are confined to that of a further provision for revenue and the support of public credit, by taxation on untaxed or lightly taxed articles of import, to produce an addition to the present revenue of three millions of dollars a year; an authority to allow interest on all outstanding Treasury notes, as under the last issue thereof; and the establishment of a warehousing system.

THE INSTITUTE FOR THE BLIND.

The eighth annual report of the Managers of the Pennsylvania Institute for the Blind, states that there are now in the Institution sixty-one pupils. In sex they are nearly equally divided, and their ages vary from five to forty. Of the pupils, 46 are natives of Pennsylvania; 7 of Maryland; 5 of New Jersey; 2 of Delaware; and 1 of South Carolina. The indigent pupils of this State are admitted free, while those from other States are subject to a tax of $200 per annum—the States of Maryland, New Jersey, and Delaware, by acts of Legislature, making liberal appropriations for the pupils of their respective States.

A leading object of our calling public attention to the Institution now, is to remind the benevolent that the Institution is now, in a great measure, dependent upon the liberality of the philanthropic.

By an act of the Pennsylvania Legislature, passed the 27th of January, 1834, it was resolved, that the sum of $106 for each indigent pupil of the State should be appropriated, until the said appropriation, for said purpose, reached the sum of $20000: provided, also, that no pupil should be educated at the expense of the State for a longer term than six years. The same act directed an order to be drawn in favor of the Institution for $16,000. Owing, however, to the embarrassed condition of the State finances, the bequest of $106 per annum, for each pupil, has long ceased to operate.

At this age of the world, and in a Commonwealth which has so distinguished itself by enlightened humanity to those to whom nature has denied the advantage of the possession of their faculties, it is surely unnecessary to argue in favor of the propriety of instructing the blind. Under instruction, they not only derive great moral advantages, but they are relieved from the terrible ennui of want of occupation, and are enabled to contribute in no small degree to their own support.

FROM BRAZIL.

Intelligence from Brazil is by Rio Janeiro papers, to the 2d of November. A frigate and corvette were fitting out to proceed to Naples, to bring over Dona Maria Teresa Christina, the affianced of his youthful majesty of Brazil, Don Pedro Second. Matrimonial festivities would appear to promise to be in the ascendant in Brazil, as two European princes are on their way to that country, to solicit the hand of a sister of the Emperors.

The other rebellions having been suppressed, Fidel Macahal the Baron de Cazias set out for Rio Grande on the 29th of October. His last order from the Emperor was given in these words—"Put down the rebellion in Rio Grande as you have put down the others." Brief and explicit. This rebellion put down, it is said that war is next to be declared against Monte Video.

A VERY GOOD SUGGESTION.

A correspondent of the United States Gazette, remarks that there are very many poor families in great distress for the want of a stove, and very many rich families, who have discarded stoves, for which they have no use. If, says the writer, these stoves could be put in the hands of the Western Soup Society, corner of George and Schuylkill, they might be put to charitable use. The suggestion is a capital one, and we hope it will be attended too, all over the city, the dancers admiring the nearest Society to take the gift in charge. To give away what one does not need or prize is the easiest kind of charity, and may, still, be as effective as any other. The difference between the rich and poor is only that the latter suffer, for the want of what one to the rich superfluities.

THE MARCH OF TEMPERANCE.

Dublin paper states that at the late wake of a man in Tipperary, although 40,000 persons were drinking, not a blow was struck, and very few words were seen. The absence of drunken scenes is, for the absence of blows, and the thoroughness, man is accounted for by the potion which was reformation—the glorious peaceful state of Ireland, place in Ireland. The peacetime length and breadth and breadth. Under these things may be noted by the Emerald Isle similar that golden age, exhibiting indeed has returned nymph adorned with giddy Moore, when the unguarded and unmolested, and man, walked breadth of the land.

But, Ireland is not alone. Our witnessed a change as proof, and sympathy has We have to be sure no single Pilgrim-enough, recognized as the one great apostle of Mahomet, but we have advocates and successful advocates, reformation, by the score. And the wounded every where the great assistants and defenders of reform. It is stated in an exchange paper that the ladies of Nantucket raised and paid eight hundred dollars, during the last season, for the promotion of temperance. And that, we know, is the spirit by which the better and gentler sex are animated and moved throughout the land. Nor do they give their money alone but their time and labor; and, better and more efficient agents than all the rest, in the reformation of the other sex—their love and their smiles. No cause can lag or falter with such supporters—its progress must be ever onward. Bachelors must be temperate to win the belles; strictly temperate bachelors never make drunken husbands—and temperate parents, who taste not, touch not, are sure to rear temperate children.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

The following is a copy of a memorial which is circulating for signatures in the city of New York:

"Your Petitioners confidently believing that the continuance of the "Act to establish a uniform System of Bankruptcy" throughout the United States, will produce a most salutary effect in the prevention of overtrading and of the undue inflation of credit, and will tend to the equal distribution of the assets of the unfortunate debtor among his creditors, to the prevention of fraud, and to the relief of the honest debtor; and believing also that the most objectionable feature of the said Act has already exhausted its chief effects in the discharge of debts contracted before the passage of the act, and that the fair course of legislation which would be exhibited in the entire repeal of the Act, would operate injuriously upon the interests of all classes of the community, and unjustly upon the rights of those who have not commenced their proceedings for a discharge under the provisions of said Act before the sitting of the present Congress—do respectfully demonstrate against the repeal of the said Act."

In this city a memorial is in circulation, the request of which is to prevent all retrospection beyond the first of February, 1843, when the present law became operative. The Judge shall appoint the assignees on nomination of a majority of creditors. The appeal and trial by jury shall be allowed to the creditor, and that an appeal from the judgment of inferior Courts shall be allowed to that at Washington.

THE WEST INDIES.

In our last we gave a report, via. New Orleans, that an expedition was fitting out from Cuba, against St. Domingo, on account of the capture of some Spanish vessels by the Haytiens. Subsequent advices lead to the belief that this affair may, after all, blow over. The Haytiens say that they were driven by hunger and necessity to the capture, and that all they have taken, they are ready to pay for. When the fearful calamities by which the island of St. Domingo has been visited, earthquake, inundation, pestilence, and consequent famine, are remembered, this statement seems reasonable enough; and in case of its truth, it is not unlikely that the matter may blow over.

CHRISTMAS TEMPERANCE CONCERT.

Active preparations are making to decorate the Chinese Saloon for a Concert and Grand Juvenile entertainment, on Monday afternoon, December 26th, which day is expected to be generally appropriated to the amusement of the young. We understand that the arrangements are in a manner that will astonish those who may be there on that occasion, and we expect to see more merry faces there than at any other time, should the weather prove favorable.

THE MUTINY.

As painfully interesting to the whole country, we give a full report of such events as have transpired, connected with the attempted mutiny on board the United States War Brig, Somers. The account we have selected, as being most minute, and still expressed in a style most concise, is that published originally in the New York Courier and Enquirer. We may add that it has in the manner of its relation, and in the language by which it is introduced, all the appearance of authenticity. The Somers arrived at Boston, on her return from a cruise on the African coast on Wednesday of last week. An official account of the events below narrated was immediately despatched to Washington. The New York newspaper reporters did not get hold of the matter until P. day afternoon. On Saturday nearly all the New York newspapers had more or less of it. On Monday appeared in the Courier and Inquirer the account which we have annexed; and a more perfect one may not probably be expected, until after the developments of the Court of Inquiry.

In introducing the narrative, the Courier remarks: "We would merely premise, that although our account is not official, and although it may not comport with Mr. Mackenzie's notions of Naval Etiquette to approve of such a detailed statement as we are prepared to give, yet it may be relied upon as actually embracing most of the particulars of that gentleman's report to the Secretary of the Navy; and as we do not hold ourselves responsible to the distinguished Naval officers now on Table, for what we may deem proper to make public under existing circumstances, we hope that they will agree with us, that the sooner the truth reaches the public the better it will be for all parties as well as for the character of the Navy; and in consequence, not give themselves any unnecessary trouble to ascertain our source of information." The narrative then proceeds:

The Somers sailed from New York about three months since, with a crew of eighty apprentices, eighteen ordinary seamen, and an orderly Sergeant of Marines, who acted as master at arms. She was commanded by Master Commandant Slidell Mackenzie, well known to the Navy as one of our most exemplary officers, and to the literary world, as the author of a "Year in Spain." Her officers consisted of Lieut. Gansevoort of Albany, and five or six Midshipmen, among whom was Philip Spencer, son of the Secretary of War, and two sons of Commodore Perry.

Having delivered the despatches with which he was charged, to the Commanding officer on the Coast of Africa, Capt. Mackenzie sailed for this port with the publicly avowed intention of touching at St. Thomas for provisions previous to coming on our Coast at this season of the year. A day or two previous to December 1st, and when the vessel was within about five or six hundred miles from St. Thomas, Midshipman Spencer hinted a part of his plan to Mr. Wales, the Purser's steward, who offered a hearty co-operation, took an oath of secrecy, &c., which Spencer administered to him, when he made more fully acquainted with the plan of the mutineers. They had arranged to raise a scuffle on the forecastle some night after leaving St. Thomas, while the deck was in charge of Midshipman Rogers, a nephew of the late Com. John Rogers; and when the men engaged in it would of course be ordered aft to account for the cause of the disturbance, and while Mr. Rogers was thus engaged, they were to seize, gag and throw him overboard, with as little noise as possible. Spencer was then to enter the cabin and kill Capt. Mackenzie; and others were appointed to be stationed at the main hatch, through which the crew must pass to get on deck, and at the steerage hatch, through which all the officers except the Captain, must pass. All the officers, except the Surgeon, were to be murdered and thrown overboard; and the crew, who were below, were to be mustered on deck. The two other guns were to be pointed forward, to secure the mutineers from an attack, and such of the crew who had not yet joined, but who then elected to come in with them, were to be admitted, while the others were to be thrown overboard.

They were then to get out all the boats and lighten the vessel, after which they were to make for the Isle of Pines, where they were to meet a confederate. They were then to cruise in search of merchant vessels, trading between this port and Europe; which after being plundered, and the males on board killed, were to be indiscriminately sunk; and if there chanced to be any females, they were to be taken on board the Somers, and retained so long as the pirates might desire, when they also were to be committed to the deep! The arrangements for the division of the spoils, the allotment of the females, the various officers on board, &c., were all completed, and drawn up in detail in SPENCER'S HAND-WRITING; and he assured Mr. Wales that he had twenty of the crew with him sure.

From the moment Spencer made the above circumstances known to Mr. Wales, he was watched with Argus eyes by Samuel Cromwell, boatswain's mate, and Elisha Small, seaman, who were the principal ringleaders with Spencer, and who threatened to throw him overboard, the moment they saw the least sign of defection in him, or had the least cause to suspect that he had made or intended to make any disclosures to any person.

Mr. Wales not daring to communicate with Capt. Mackenzie, made all the circumstances as detailed by Midshipman Spencer, known to the Purser, who promptly conveyed the intelligence to Capt. Mackenzie, when measures were immediately taken to ascertain the truth of the case. Spencer's papers were thoroughly examined, and all the details of their plans as narrated by Wales, were fully confirmed. Spencer, Cromwell, and Small, were then secured, and all hands being mustered on deck, Capt. Mackenzie addressed them on the subject of the projected mutiny, apprising them that all the plans of the mutineers had been discovered and frustrated, and warning them of the consequences of any similar attempt.

Capt. Mackenzie then addressed a circular letter to each of the officers on board the vessel, except the acting Midshipmen, requesting their opinion as to their course of conduct which should be pursued towards Spencer and the two men who had been arrested with him. Each one returned for answer that they deserved immediate death, and Capt. Mackenzie's opinion coinciding with that of his officers, it was determined to carry the punishment into immediate execution. All hands were accordingly called to witness punishment. Whips were then rove into each end of the fore yard arm, and one on the inner part of the yard. The prisoners were then brought on deck and informed of the punishment about to be executed upon them. Small at once confessed his guilt, and asked most pentinently the forgiveness of Commander and the officers, which was at once added to him. He then obtained permission to participate over, which he did, warning them against the like, in themselves ever to be enclosed as he had was chosen committal of the crime for which he PRESCRIBED death.

Small and complied a couple of VERY MINUTES for himself, and, as he was in guilt, in order that they might if he wished to assign grounded, and he was asked replied that as his his father or mother; but he his guilt and the justice. He then acknowledged marked that he would rather his punishment, and so (at one) then to be subject of such a death there of infamy of exposure was extended to upwards of and for by Spencer, whole of which time was employed him in endeavoring to obtain forgiveness of his having endured him into the committal of his for which he was so soon to expiate with his life. Small with hold his forgiveness for a length of time; at last in reply to Spencer's oft reiterated request, "Do forgive me, Small," he said that he fully pardoned him.

Every thing being in readiness, the noose placed around the neck of each of the culprits, and the officers were stationed about the decks to see that every man had both hands on the ropes. About one o'clock, (sea time) on the 1st of December, the signal for execution was given by firing a gun to leeward, and the guilty men were run up.

After hanging about an hour, the bodies were lowered down and delivered to their several messmates to be laid out and sewed up; and in the evening they were committed to the deep. Captain Mackenzie reading the service usual on the occasion of burials at sea. Small's last words were to invoke a blessing on the American flag, and to ask forgiveness for having so dishonored it; but the Notes of New Works.

SCALPS AND MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS, by Thomas Bewick—No. IV.—Philada.: Carey & Hart.—The volume, a continuation of the series, is in the public are so much indebted to Messrs. Carey & Hart. It contains: Comic Delineations of Human Life, The Late Lord Holland, Warren and Frederic the Great, from the Edinburg Review. Of these papers the first and second are the best known in this country. The first is a review of a work by Leigh Hunt, and has all the graphic vigor of Macaulay, the brilliant wit which characterizes the criticism which follows it, and the touches of pathos which it is brought to bear upon which it is brought to bear. The articles have been every where read and admired.

The volume seems to us chiefly valuable, for the sake of the just published "Lays of Ancient Rome." The preface to these Lays will give a new popularity to classic lore, brief as it is, and is marked by the usual habits of thought of the writer. The Lays are a sparkling freshness with which we did not dream that the legends, half fable, half history, of antiquity could be invented; much as they have been hammered upon by pedants of all ages.

We are pleased to notice that Messrs. Carey & Hart announce also as preparing for publication, the Miscellanies of James Stephens, Esq., containing The Port Royalists, Ignatius Loyola, Alison's French Revolution, &c. These reviews, have been widely sought for Macauley's—no small evidence of their excellence. We are also to have, complete and without abridgement, the far famed Notes of Christopher North. Verily these publishers deserve well of their country.

THE DESERTED BRIDE, AND OTHER POEMS.—By G. P. Morris. New York: Appleton & Company.—This, in point of illustration and general getting up, is, if we except one or two of the annuals, the most magnificent volume of the season, and when the price, (only two dollars) is also considered, we are truly amazed, at the luxury in the way of literature which we have here presented to us. There are in the volume some of the most delightful wood engravings, in illustration of passages in the text, that we have ever seen, and in this respect the volume rivals the illustrated Gray's Elegy, and other works which have been published across the ocean. Nor are the drawings all of one character, but the scenery and figures introduced, give play for all variety of conceit, pathetic, romantic and picturesque, still and placid, bizarre, grotesque, and humorous.

Of the verse thus attractively adorned, the public has already heard much criticism. Friends, though they may have in some instances over-rated the merit of Gen. Morris's productions, have not in their general opinion gone in advance of the verdict of the public. Some of the songs of Gen. Morris have never been exceeded by any writer in this country; and in his poetry the delightful ease of the versification is more uniformly noticeable than in that of any other American writer. Splendidly as the book is executed, we consider the text, by its character, admirably fitted for illustration, and in its merit worthy of its dress.

EDUCATION. By H. J. Smith, A. M., Professor of Modern Languages in Pennsylvania College, and Professor of German Language and Literature in the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg, Penna. Family Library, No. 156. New York: Harper & Brothers. Philadelphia: Perkins & Purves.—This volume is divided into two parts, the first containing a history of Education, ancient and modern. It is based on the German of Schwarz, but is of course condensed and abridged so much, that the labor involved was even more than would be required to prepare an original treatise. Some departures from the original plan were also necessary, and many original observations are introduced. The second part of the work is devoted to a plan of culture and instruction, based on Christian principles, and designed to aid in the right education of youth, physically, intellectually, and morally.

We are glad to find by this issue that the Harpers' have resumed the publication of their excellent Library, and recovered from the interruption caused by the fire in their establishment.

HISTORY OF EUROPE from the commencement of the French Revolution in 1789, to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. By Archibald Alison. New York: Harper & Brothers.—The style in which this work is produced is the social, so much in vogue at the present day. The advantages of this method of publication do not need to be dwelt upon, as the patronage of the public to such enterprises has demonstrated how convenient and excellent the mode has been found. The work under notice, in the English edition, costs fifty dollars—the American reader will receive it for four. The typography and general appearance of the work is worthy of the reputation of the established house which issues it; and we commend its purchase to all heads of families who would make the family library valuable in essentials and important works. The numbers, as they appear in this city, may be had of Perkins & Purves, and of Burgess & Zieber.

TRUILA, a Poem by Dr. J. C. Palmer, of the U. N. Navy. New York: S. Colman. Philadelphia: Godey & McMichael.—The theme of this poem is found in the adventures of the United States Schooner, Flying Fish, one of the Exploring Squadron. The new name which the port has conferred upon the little vessel, is derived from the classic Thule, a truly appropriate one in this instance, for the Flying Fish probably penetrated farther into the unknown latitudes than any other the voyage of which has been recorded. Besides the poem, we have in an appendage a well written prose account of her adventures.

The verse is sprightly—graphic in description, and strong and terse in the relation of incidents. The embellishments are twelve in number, beautifully executed engravings by A. T. Agate, illustrative of passages in the poem. It is altogether a gem of a book.

DAWNINGS OF GENIUS. By Anne Pratt, Author of Flowers and their Associations. New York: Appletons'. Philadelphia: G. S. Appleton.—With the motto that "Even the child may be known by his deeds," we have here sketches of the early lives of Sir Humphrey Davy, Rev. George Crabbe, Baron Cuvier, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Lindley Murray, Sir James McIntosh, and Adam Clarke. The volume is one of the Appletons' "Library for My Young Countrymen," and while what is known of the childhood and youth of the eminent men above mentioned is minutely given, sufficient is said of their after lives to give the young folks incentive to emulation. It is a very appropriate book for young people, and very interesting withal.

THE STORY BOOK.—By T. S. Arthur—Philadelphia: Godey & McMichael.—This is a collection in a small volume, of some of Mr. Arthur's capital stories, addressed to youth; and we heartily wish that it could be put into the hands of every minor in the land. That we take it, is saying enough, if our opinion is worth any thing, to induce parents to put it into their Christmas parcels.

SUSAN HOPLEY is the title of an exceedingly interesting story, now ready, in the cheap form, by Burgess & Ziebber.

BURGESS' NOVELTY LITERARY.—Under this title Burgess & Ziebber have commenced the publication of a series of ten novels, the whole set to be sold at two dollars, single works at 25 cents each. The two first selections show excellent judgment, being Vivian Grey, by D'Israeli, and Romance and Reality, by Miss Landon. The third number of the Library is Venetia. From the same publishers we have also, the second number of Brande's Encyclopedia, the Spy, the Boston Miscellany for January, Tom Jones, Nicholas Nickleby, Ernest Maltravers, Knickerbocker, No. 6 of the French Revolution, and Memoirs of the Queens of France.

PLEASANT MEMORIES OF PLEASANT LANDS—By Mrs. Sigourney—Boston: Munroe & Co—Philadelphia: Perkins & Purves.—This volume is tastefully got up for the holidays, and embellished with a view of Abbotsford, and a vignette of the Obelisk of Luxor, at Paris. It is made up of the "memories" of the gifted writer, of her European tour, gracefully written in verse and prose. Altogether it is a acceptable work, and will command a prominence among the books of the season. And notice.

SELF CULTURE—By William Ellery Channing—With a brief Biographical by Perkins & James Munroe & Co—Philadelphia of Dr. Channing's Lectures on Self Culture. The Lectures were since, before a Boston audience delivered; but beside the fact that the first is an convenient one, incomparably a

THE TRUE GREEK FORTUNE, OR THE BEGGAR OF THE FINE ARTS—Boston: Munroe & Co.—of the Perkins & Purves—This is a very Philadelphia tale, translated from the German of Hauff. Interesting tales are out of the stereotype track of "true stories," and although we cannot entirely commend the writers taste in incidents, we are bound to allow his apology, that they are true.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK—January, 1843.—This number is embellished with three engravings, "Devotion" a beautiful mezzotint, The Blind Beggar, from Wilkie's painting, a plate of Birds, and a plate of Fashions. The contents of the number are entirely from the pens of ladies; and we have only room to say that the number makes a most excellent commencement of the New Year.

GEORGE ST. GEORGE JULIAN.—Colon has followed his four number edition of Harry Lorrequer, with one of "The Prince" the first number of which has been issued. One dollar, with the embellishments, is cheap enough.

JACK HINTON, THE GUARDSMAN—By Charles Lever—Philadelphia: Carey & Hart.—This is a cheap edition of an amusing work, to which our readers need no introduction. It is published in one volume, at fifty cents.

PHRENOLOGY.—Mr. Fowler has written a book on Phrenology, as applied to Marriage, which is for sale at Colon's; as are also The Journal, and other Phrenological works.

☞ From Drew & Scammell we have the "Lady's Wreath, Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, and the Cold Water Magazine," for December.

THE LADIES' MUSICAL LIBRARY, published by Godey & McMichael, commences the new year with a brilliant collection of music.

☞ Perkins & Purves have sent us Ernest Maltravers and the second part of Brande's Encyclopedia.

WORLDS DISPLAYED is the title of a neat little juvenile gift book, published by Griffith & Simon.

General News.

MORE DEPRECATION.—The Savannah papers contain the report of the Select Committee appointed to investigate the condition of the Central Bank. The Republican, speaking of the report, says:—"There is an acknowledged total deficit of assets to the enormous amount of $1,334,000. We observe that there are $262 218 of notes over due, and $728,132 in attorney's hands. In the language of the report, 'the Bank if now left to its own resources would be utterly insolvent.' The Committee carries out the actual value of the assets of the Bank, $1,406,419, against the pretended assets, $3,561,351, as furnished by the directors."

THE CASE OF MRS. SPIRES.—The Methodists of Cincinnati have expelled from the society five persons, who were engaged in and cognizant of the maltreatment of Mrs. Stibbs, the old woman who was so cruelly neglected by her relatives. The report of the Committee of the Church is officially published, and makes the horrible circumstances still more aggravated than at first report. Robert Richardson, Mrs. Richardson, Mrs. Crosby, Mrs. Walker and Samuel Stibbs are the names of the relatives.

A WOLF IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.—At a village in Bucks county, in this State, a gentleman by the name of Sheap was robbed of his clothing during the night, by a room companion—a pompous, self-important, dressy little fellow, calling himself Col. A. Wolf, who forced an undue share of civility upon him, during an hour or two's acquaintance. In the morning Wolfe was not to be found, but parents being made, he was soon overhauled, dressed entirely in Sheap's clothing.

WARING UP.—A sale has lately been made of the pine timber, growing upon a lot of land of about 150 acres, in Waterford, Oxford county, Maine, for the sum of ten thousand five hundred dollars; and those who are familiar with the business say that the purchaser, at the present depressed prices for lumber, will make five thousand dollars by the purchase.

THE MARQUESAS.—A late arrival at Boston confirms the report that the French have taken possession of the Marquesas, or Washington Islands. They had landed two hundred men, and commenced building a fort. As these islands are to us chiefly valuable as stopping points for whalers, we cannot see that this change will make much difference.

GENERAL JOSE MARIE TORRIJAL, Minister of War and Marine of Mexico, has sent to the National Institute, at Washington, three boxes, containing minerals and beautiful crystallizations, from Guanajuato, as a proof of his profound gratitude for the honor it has conferred upon him, by placing him on the list of its corresponding members.

THAT BRIDGE.—The Committee of Investigation upon the $1000 bribe to the Sheriff of New York to refrain from hanging Colt, has been unable to come to any satisfactory conclusion. The man who brought the letter to the Sheriff's house was wrapped in a great coat, and came in a cab, but neither can be identified.

SERIOUSLY.—We learn from the Newburyport Herald, that Mr. Colman, of that town, has a large and elegant sleigh, which was built at a cost of five hundred dollars! It was built for the accommodation of New England Sleigh-Riding and Dancing Parties. It will pay for itself in one winter, probably.

MERRIE EDWARDS.—An exchange paper says: "Monroe Edwards, who is at Sing-Sing, still endeavors to make the simple-minded people believe that he possesses great wealth." We do not comprehend what "simple-minded people" Edwards can reach, unless his keepers are thus designated.

☞ It is stated that the Governments of Central America, Chili, Bolivia, Peru, and New Grenada, have agreed to the assembling of a general Congress at Lima. If the deliberations of this Congress are conducted in the right spirit, and its decisions are respected, great good will follow.

CARRIER PIGEONS.—A carrier pigeon was recently despatched from Boston to Salem, and reached the latter place (fifteen miles) in the incredibly short space of an hour and a quarter. The Boston Post recommends that when next sent, the pigeon be despatched by the railroad cars.

THE DEBT OF GREAT BRITAIN, in silver, would load 236,250 wagons, allowing each to carry 2,000 pounds, and allowing each team 30 feet, would form a line over 1,700 miles in length. If reduced to cents, it would load 2,837,500 wagons, and form a line twice round the globe.

MORE LIBERAL.—A letter from Hamburg states that a proposition is about to be made to the Senate to authorize Jews to become purchasers of houses or land in all parts of that city. Hitherto, they have been allowed to make purchases only in particular streets.

☞ The New Orleans papers state that Jefferson College, in the parish of St. James, Louisiana, which was lately destroyed by fire, is now fully rebuilt, and open for the accommodation of students.

☞ The total number of vessels which have been entered at all the ports of the United States, during the year 1841, was 12,373. Of these 7735 were American, and 4538 foreign.

☞ The Presbyterian Church in Leight street, New York, has been purchased by a Baptist Congregation under the pastorship of the Rev. Mr. Evevie.

PORTSMOUTH'S DAY.—The 23d, the anniversary of the landing of the Forefathers of New England, at Plymouth, was celebrated in New York by the New England Society, on The General, is POSTAGE.—The Legislature of New Hampshire has passed a series of resolutions, one of which declares that the franking privilege should be abolished; and that postmasters, members of Congress, and officers of the Government, should not be allowed to transmit, at the public expense, any letters or other matter of a private character. Another of the resolutions declares that a reduction of the rates on letter postage is loudly called for; and that such a reduction would secure a more equal participation of the benefits which should be enjoyed by the community, and that it would probably increase the income of the Department.

OHIO.—On Tuesday, the 13th, the Ohio Legislature elected Wm. Allen an U. S. Senator for six years. Allen received 63 votes. Thomas Ewing received 44. Governor Shannon was inaugurated the same day, and delivered an inauguration address.

MORE RUMORS.—It is rumored in Washington, that Judge Porter, brother of the Governor of this State, is to be appointed Secretary of War, and the present incumbent of that office, Mr. Spencer, to be appointed Secretary of the Treasury.

☞ Mr. Huger has been elected to the United States Senate from South Carolina, in place of Mr. Calhoun. Of course the rumor that the Legislature would not accept the resignation of the latter gentleman is now proved unfounded.

MR. MCDUFFIE.—It is stated, on good authority, that Mr. McDuffie will not accept the election of the Legislature to the Senate, for the unexpired term of Mr. Preston; that he does not refuse for the next regular term.

☞ The Virginia House of Delegates have passed a resolution, 75 to 45, instructing the Senators in Congress to vote for refunding to Gen. Jackson, with interest, the fine of $1000 imposed upon him by Judge Hall.

GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.—On Thursday, James McDowell, Esq., was chosen by the Legislature of Virginia, as Governor of that State. The vote stood for McDowell, 110, scattering, 56.

☞ The New Hampshire House of Representatives has resolved that they will not district the State for the choice of Representatives in Congress.

☞ It is rumored, says the Pittsburg Advertiser, that Judge Patton has been appointed Charge d'Affaires to Denmark.

Local Intelligence.

SOUTHWARK.—From the report of Archibald Cozens, the superintendent of the district of Southwark, it appears that 261 new buildings have been put up in that district, since the first of January last. Twenty of the number were frames, built on lots not fronting upon the line of the street. Of the brick buildings, 197 were three stories high, 31 two stories high, 2 one story high, and 4 four stories high. Included in the number are four Roman Catholic, and three churches, one Episcopal, one Methodist. The number as reported last year, was 161, being an excess this year of one hundred buildings.

CLOTH CASES.—Seven cloth cases were decided in the United States District Court on Friday week. In all of which, the juries rendered verdicts in favor of the United States, against the whole, or a portion of the goods seized. There were one hundred and sixty-five pieces of cloths and cassimeres altogether, one hundred and fifty-one of which were condemned for fraudulent importation. There remains now but one more of this kind of cases to be determined.

MOYAMENSING.—Fifty-three permits for building new houses in the district of Moyamensing, have been taken out in the past year, but it is believed that nearly twice that number of houses have been erected. They are mostly three stories high. Included in the number is the Union Temperance Hall in Christian street near Eleventh.

PUBLIC EXAMINATION.—The semi-annual public examination of the scholars of the Central High School commenced on Wednesday last, and lasted three days. The progress of the scholars, as evinced by their readiness in answering questions not preconcerted, justified all that has been said in praise of the seminary.

LECTURES.—The Rev. T. H. Stockton intends to deliver the first of a series of Lectures on Sabbath (Christmas) evening. The subject will be "The Birth of Christ." We commend these lectures especially to the attention of the young men of the city. They will be the most eloquent discourses of the season.

SENTENCE OF ALEXANDER.—It was expected that this young man would be sentenced on Wednesday, for the death of Mr. Lougee, but by arrangement of counsel, sentence was deferred until Saturday.

Notices of the Dead.

EBENEZER BELLWAP, a Revolutionary soldier, died in New York last week, aged 81 years. He was a native of Durham, in Connecticut, but had long been a resident of New York. He had received a classical education, was a zealous Republican of the Jeffersonian school, the principles of which he formerly supported with considerable ability with his pen, being a frequent contributor to the Argus, a paper published in New York, and also to the Aurora of Philadelphia.

DEATH OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.—Since the election of members of the present Congress, ten deaths have occurred among them. The deceased are, Samuel L. Southard, Senator from New Jersey, Richard W. Habersham, Representative from Georgia, W. S. Hastings, of Massachusetts, James W. Williams, of Maryland, Lewis Williams of North Carolina, and James Dimock, W. S. Ramsey, Joseph Lawrence, Charles Ogle, and Henry Black, of Pennsylvania.

DEATH OF MR. FRENCH.—The Boston papers announce, with sentiments of deep respect for his memory, the death of Arthur French, of that city. Mr. French was prominent for many years, in the discussion of political subjects in Boston, and was endeared to men of all parties by his estimable qualities.

SEVERE DISCRIMINATION.—Abraham A. Keyser, Esq. Editor of the Schenectady Reflector, in the short space of eleven days lost all his children, four in number, between the ages of three and eleven years, by that dreadful scourge scarlet fever.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Charles W. Karthaus, Esq., President of the Neptune Insurance Company of Baltimore, died very suddenly on last Thursday week. Mr. Karthaus has long ranked as a respectable and intelligent merchant.

DEATH OF BISHOP DUBOIS.—We learn by a slip from the office of the Freeman's Journal, that the death of the Rt. Rev. John Dubois, Bishop of New York, took place on Tuesday morning at 9 o'clock.

☞ The Southern Whig announces the death of Edward Paine, Esq., the oldest lawyer in Georgia.

Army & Navy.

☞ The U. S. ship of the line Delaware, Com. Morris, frigate Columbia, Captain Shubrick, and sloop-of-war Enterprise, Captain Wilson, were at Rio Janeiro, Oct. 22th. The Enterprise was to sail in two days for Buenos Ayres; the Delaware and Columbia would soon follow.

THE UNION.—A trial of the machinery of the new U. S. steamer Union was made at Washington a few days ago, and succeeded to admiration. It is thought that the "Union" will be ready for a trip down the river in about ten days. Then the Congressmen will take holiday.

☞ The U. S. brig Oregon, L. M. Powell, Lieut. Comd'g, arrived at Charleston on Thursday, from New York. The O. is on a surveying expedition.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. Benton's bill to repeal the Bankrupt Law, has, in the Senate been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and a resolution offered by the same gentleman asking the President of the United States for information in relation to the squadron designed under the recent treaty for the African coast, is under debate. Mr. Linn has introduced a bill into the Senate to remit General Jackson's fine, and it was made the special order of the day for Wednesday of this week.

On Friday and Saturday of last week the Senate did not sit; and on Monday last nothing was done in either House, beyond the usual testimonial of respect for the memory of Mr. Habersham, of Georgia. Among the memorials presented in the Senate, we notice one by Mr. Buchanan, of this State, numerously signed by persons in Philadelphia, engaged in the manufacture of hats, asking that furs may be admitted free o duty.

The House has been engaged upon the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, for the half calendar year, closing on the thirtieth of June 1843. This bill embraces only those annual items, which will be settled with least debate, having the debatable questions for a supplementary act. The only alteration we have noticed made by the Committee of the Whole, in the original bill, has been the reduction of the appropriation for the coast survey, from fifty to twenty thousand dollars.

Among the resolutions adopted by the House are: inquiring into the amount of fees, &c. of courts and clerks, under the Bankrupt Act; instructing the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to consider the expediency of renewing the provisions of the act of July 7, 1838, in behalf of certain widows; and abolishing the refectories in the basement of the Capitol. The latter requires the concurrence of the Senate, before it becomes effectual.

A resolution was offered in the House on Thursday, making inquiry as to the circumstances attending the removal of Jonathan Roberts, collector of Philadelphia, but the House refused to suspend the rules to receive it—yeas 96, nays 81—not two-thirds.

The memorial of Washington Irving and others, relative to the international copy right law has been again referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who are also instructed to consider the expediency of amending generally, the copy right law.

Bills have been introduced into the Senate, to regulate the value of foreign gold and currency in the United States, and to make compensation to pension agents.

In the House, an attempt was made on Tuesday to call upon the President of the United States for information relative to the Somers mutiny, but the House refused to suspend the rules. The principal part of the day was spent in debate on Mr. Everett's bill to repeal the Bankrupt Law. The previous question was at length moved by Mr. Pickens. He said it was evident a majority were for repeal; and, by raising collateral questions, they might be defeated, if the friends of the Bankrupt Law were sufficiently active. Without taking the question, a motion was made to adjourn, which prevailed—yeas 88, nays 75.

CORRECTION.—The charge of whitewashing the English churches, to hide the paintings, carved work, &c., is generally attributed to the Reformers in the days of Henry VIII., or Elizabeth. Many circumstances, however, says a late writer, show that most of the whitewashing was done during the great rebellion, and was not intended as a work of defacement, but to serve as a defence against Cromwell's Iconoclasts.

Our Mail Receipts.

We are daily in the receipt of letters enclosing money with the request to return a receipt by mail. We do not send receipts in that way. Every dollar received by mail, for the Post, is acknowledged as below. Subscribers will please notice this.

Subscribers living in the vicinity of a Post Master can call upon him and have their letters containing money franked, if the letter contains nothing but what relates to the business of the office. Many hundred dollars might be saved us, if attention was generally paid to this matter.

Gems from the Poets.

WINTER EVENING, AT HOME.

BY MRS. SOUTHEY.

Fire extinct! time at the ability day's decline
Of sharp December, through my cottage pane
Dim hardly look, smiling, though in the wane,
Its thoughts, in contrast, cosmic and bland of shine.
Wonders my heart, whilst I by mere survey
Then slowly wheeling on thy evening way;
And this my fire, wheel dim, cumbed light,
Just glimmering, hide each shadowy image fall
Sometimes and strange upon the dark'ning wall.
Ere the clear tapers chase the drop'ning night!
Yet thy will art, upon through the frosty hour,
Shines calm and clear without; and within I gaze
I think—around me in this twilight room—
I but remark novelty's and gloom.
Whilst hope, and joy, cheerfulness and soft appear
In the sweet home that lights thy distant sphere!

From the Monthlies.

FROM THE LADY'S BOOK, FOR JANUARY.

THE YOUNG SOUTHERN WIDOW.

BY MRS. A. M. F. ANNAN.

"Grimmer is he
The evening moth which cunning times put on
To entrap the wisest."—Merchant of Venice.

"Were we there ever such a hot day in June?"

"I do wonder if it can be as warm at home?"

"We should all be melted into shadows!"

"I have never known anything like it, and I am the oldest they never present!—never!"

With these several exclamations, and a dozen others, equally pointed and original, the visitors at the Springs dispersed from the dinner table of the hotel, the young ladies to plan future flirtations, or to pore over the latest Magazines on their beds; the old ones to free themselves from the remarks imparted upon them by society, in the shape of tight dresses; the senior gentlemen to speculate upon the political state of the country, and on the affairs at home, as treated of in the contents of a newly arrived mail-bag; and their juniors to smoke cigars, drink ice-water, shop, bathe, walk, hunt or fish, whichever of their individual privileges they chose to avail themselves of. All parties, however, were unanimous in one thing: to vary their different occupations by a general saunter, every ten minutes, against the weather. The only comfortable person about the house was the landlord, who, regarding every complaint as a promise of a new arrival to his long ranges of unfilled rooms, would have been satisfied to see the mercury rise 20° higher.

Besides a few children, who were lying and rolling about on the green beds, left at perfect liberty, for once, by their dowdy nurses, to get their skins tanned and their constitutions tempered to much or they pleased, the exterior of the building exhibited not a form of animal life except those of two gentlemen, occupying a corner of a piazza, which, from being in shade nearly the whole of the day, was a retreat not a little desirable in an afternoon like the present. They were both ostensibly engaged in reading; the one lying on a settee on the outside of a parlor window, and the other leaning forward over a book from a sofa within.

"Of all the dull weeks I have ever spent at a watering place, this last has been immeasurably the dullest," remarked the outside lounger, whom we shall call Hazelwood, a man of twenty-eight or thirty, with a well made person of the middle height, a florid, animated countenance, bespeaking much boldness and decision of character, and an air indicating the man of the world and the gentleman. His companion, whom he addressed by the name of Revlere, was rather younger in appearance than himself, tall, and exceedingly graceful, and having features of the handsomest and most intellectual order, with an expression that discovered, through every, perhaps, sometimes called effeminate; and below invariably, interesting, poetical, and exquisite.

"It makes me yawn to think what a set we have been," continued the latter; "half a dozen Misses with their beside fell of beaux, and their hair plastered down their faces, till we can hardly see their eyes, and scarcely mental calibre enough to answer yes or no to your sentiment or wisdom speeches; a few dozen mamas and proof papas; these three college sophs, all agape, and full of Demosthenes and Cicero; three or four maiden aunts, and as many youngish married women, delicate and pale, with their little children—my insipidity and preterocity, no doubt, in their own capacity, but beyond our apprehension; and you and myself; and two or three others like us, dying of ennui; was there ever anything like it?"

"As this is one of the longest days of the season, matters may mend," replied Revlere, "though if they should not, I shall have reason to congratulate myself. I have foreworn watering places after this season and a few months of distress, like this, will be the best thing to cure me of any desire for them."

"From what project is that, pray you?"

"I have decided to retire from the world, and go to Berenice."

"To monast hobnails and linsey-woolsey, eh?"

"Pshaw! I am serious, Hazelwood; I have long once been digested with the foolerie, the inanities of fashionable life, and am resolved to lead one more worthy of a rational being."

"What did you get that out of?" asked Hazelwood, reaching for his book to look at the title; "Pickwick,—no, not here!"

"No, again said Revlere," continued Revlere, half laughing at the interruption, "I hope to have shady grove, trowling at and cool breeze of my own, without travelling to my Castle of Indolence to enjoy them. My patrimonial estate from which I have been so unwarrantably an absentee, will afford me these, with more than an abundance of the comforts of life, and my ready funds will supply me with all the luxuries and elegancies I desire. Then with books, a little company, and an adjunct which I vainly hoped I might find here—"

"A wife!" interposed Hazelwood.

"Even so; you will have reason to envy the improvement of my condition. I would have gone this summer, but the last named requisition is indispensable."

"A bright thought, to come to a place like this for a wife to correspond with your plans! couldn't you have picked one up on the next farm?"

"A woman to correspond with my plans it is not so easy to pick up; one possessed of personal beauty, gentle and elegant manners, a cultivated though feminine mind, refined tastes, warm feelings and firm principles."

"A remarkable man! you did not say large fortune, though, I presume, that is included."

"No, if she bring me all the other requisites, I shall be content to furnish the fortune, in return."

"Quite in character, mon chevalier sans reproche; for my part, I am looking out for a wife, too, but to use fortune is a very important item."

"To you! why, with what you have, that is very capacity!"

"Whatever you please, but it enters very largely into my calculations. My son, as you know, is the top of the political ladder, and unless a man has plenty of money-bags to keep him steady, that is but a dizzy height; were my present portion doubled, I could begin the ascent with perfect ease and assurance. But from my present aspirations, my dear fellow, neither of us stands much chance of being gratified. Here comes our host,—let us hear what prospects he has for the future. Have you notices of any new rooms, by the mail, Mr. Stone?"

"I was just coming to tell you, gentlemen," replied the landlord, who in the ups and downs of our times, was now taking in, for money, many whom he had formerly entertained through good-fellowship; "quite an acquisition, as I conjecture. Here is a letter from a southern friend of mine, Col. Moultrie, who requests me to have rooms prepared for Mrs. and Miss Chilton, of Lothian Place, Alabama. Have you ever heard of them?"

"I have heard of a wealthy southern family of that name," said Hazelhugh.

"And I," pursued Mr. S., "in my travels through the south, three or four years ago, was favored by the Colonel with a sight of Lothian Place. It is almost the only really lordly mansion, popular as the phrase is, that I have ever seen; an edifice not only large but embellished with every order of rooms a nobleman might be proud to inhabit, surrounded by pleasure, with stone columns supporting delightful galleries, and offices indicating designs of the most extensive hospitality. And the plantations and grounds give evidence of increasing as well as existing wealth. They are of enormous extent, and all under the finest culture, and the most tasteful arrangement; altogether one of the most valuable properties in the state. But the time is yet to come. The owner is a widow,—the handsome Mrs. Chilton, the Colonel called her; and this, no doubt, is the lady, with a daughter, perhaps. A profitable investment, either of them, gentlemen."

"A mother and daughter!—rather awkward; they would be in each other's way," said Hazelhugh.

"When do you expect them?" asked Revlere.

"The letter, which must have been detained on the road, says the last of June; this is the 20th, or, I suppose, we may look for them forthwith. Some baggage marked for them arrived by today's stage."

"Anything to stir us up a little," said Hazelhugh.

"Just then the bell of a carriage at some distance interrupted them, and on looking in the direction whence it proceeded, they saw it rapidly approaching.

"A coach and four!" exclaimed Hazelhugh.

"A southern coach, and that of very best style," said the landlord; "four splendid horses, and three colored servants,—it is southern all over. And there are two ladies inside,—Mrs. and Miss Chilton, of course."

Sundry heads were, by this time, thrust out of the upper windows, attracted by the near lumbering sound of an approaching vehicle, and the gentlemen dropped, one after another, from the piazza, there, to examine the arrival, as gentlemen will do on such occasions, to the infinite annoyance of lady travellers. The carriage stopped, and the footman sprang down and opened the door. A colored waiting-woman got out, and was followed by a lady, who merely touching the offered hand of Mr. S., stepped, with a light foot, to the ground.

"The daughter," said Hazelhugh; but no; after her came another, and young as appearance, and in your dotard the first was the widow. This was confirmed by the companion with which she returned the courtesy of the young man with the other drew down her veil, and passed the gauntlet along the piazza, escorted by Mr. S.

"S——— is mistaken, they can't be mother and daughter," said Revlere.

"No, the elder can be the widow, as I take it, can't be more than twenty-five," returned Hazelhugh; "a very pretty female,—didn't you think so? there was all possession in her money, a spirit, mirth in her tones, and dignified power in a woman of thirty-five and there. It needs a woman of that age to be entitled to, and a society of her own position in society."

"I admire the other more,—both her person and air," said Revlere. They were interrupted by some of their companions joining down to ask questions and make comments, and at length their hour arrived.

"I was right," said he, as it is the gentleman's, "The other seems to be only a attendant-in-law. Her name is Miss Chilton, she introduced her."

"That accounts for her distinct manner", an humble companion, I suppose."

"Not exactly, gentlemen, a relation of her husband's," said Revlere.

"I don't know that I heard her speak at all," considered Mr. S———; "but the widow is a remarkably sprightly, handsome woman. You will see her at the tea-table, and then you can judge for yourselves. As she has no acquaintance here, I suppose I must take it upon me to introduce her myself. I hope I shall have your assistance, gentlemen, after I shall have made you acquainted with her."

"Not unless, if I like her; I shall keep her to myself," said Hazelhugh; and shortly after they took their stand at the ending-room door, to await the entrance of the belles.

"Here they come," said Revlere, at length, and the fair sensitives were approaching, Mrs. Chilton in advance. She was of the medium height, rather fully proportioned, with a clear, healthy complexion, bright black eyes, white teeth, a pretty mouth, and a remarkably smooth, forehead, rather low, and surrounded by a profusion of dark, glossy curls. Her dress was gay and becoming. Miss Chilton was a little taller, and more delicately made, with much of the temper in her face, which in maturity held as an unfailing characteristic of the fair denizens of the south. Not unseen delicately made, with much of her, the spectators being chiefly occupied with the rich widow. Her dress was quite elegant, and she took her seat as if accustomed to encourage notice, a manner also prior proper, as it might have been remarked, in the poor relation.

By this time, the whole company present were aware of the coach and four, the two man-servants, and the waiting-maid, of Lothian Place, with its rows of marble columns, its pleasure grounds and its five or six hundred negroes, and no wonder the pretty widow was the observed of all observers. The manner of her entrance was noted by the ladies, and every ringlet, glance and smile by the gentlemen, and all were predisposed to be delighted with her. After tea Mr. S. introduced her to one or two dowagers, and that was sufficient. In a few hours, nearly the whole of the little community had been presented to her, and much was her gracefulness of manner, that, before retiring for the night, half the gentlemen made polite approaches to her, and half the ladies had called her "my dear Mrs. Chilton."

According to the elegant axiom, "it never rains but it pours," the owner of the coach and four was not the only golden shower that enriched the place. Two days after the arrival of a certain city slighted the next day, and was followed by a thick coming swarm, and all at once, the hive was filled.

"Who have you here?" was usually the first question of the newcomers, and the answer invariably began with "Mrs. Chilton, of Lothian Place, Alabama,—a rich young southern widow," and no stranger was presumed to be in good society who did not aspire to an introduction to Mrs. Chilton.

Mrs. Chilton was handed to the table by governors, senators, and secretaries; Mrs. Chilton was solicited to dance by all foreigners of distinction, and all the Beau Brummels of the different cities; Mrs. Chilton was thought about all the jewels and flounces and ruffleos on all particular occasions; Mrs. Chilton was brought to memorize all the young ladies; Mrs. Chilton was expected to criticise all the novels and magazines, and Mrs. Chilton prepared the pre-ennui, everything. She danced and dowed, and romped and flirted, and rode and read, and did all that was expected of her, which none but an indefatigable woman could have done, with the most hearty good humor. The most entire thing was allowable and becoming in her. Nobody dared to rival her, and she was so amiable that nobody thought of envying her.

"She is nothing but a girl, after all," was a remark current among the matrons; "she made a runaway match at fifteen, and was a widow at sixteen, and therefore had little matrimonial experience to settle her; and considering her immense fortune and her youth and indulgence she must always have received, it is really surprising that she should be so accessible."

Thus passed a week or two, when, one evening, Revlere was accosted by Hazelhugh with the question, "Will you join our party to-morrow? We have had nothing yet to vary the common watering-place amusements, and Mrs. Chilton and I have planned a pic-nic."

"Mrs. Chilton and you, eh?" returned Revlere significantly; "I don't know, I had half made up my mind to go homeward, or to some other place to-morrow."

"Are you disappointed, then, in your grand object, are you?"

"Totally, but you appear to be more successful, judging from your devotion to the fair widow."

"Oh, she encourages no attentions; however, I am really serious in my advances. I have not yet had an opportunity of popping the question, but to-morrow amidst the freedom and romance of a forest fête, I hope to do my war."

"What, not already! I did not think you were so very—very——"

"Heartless, or reckless, or rapacious, or anything of that sort you were going to say, upon my you! but indeed, you don't do me justice. Though I don't know that I would fancy her independent of her fortune, there is much about her that I like in addition to it. She is quite pretty, intelligent, and accomplished enough for like a wife, and her modesty; her manner is good—animated, dashing—the very thing for the wife of an ambitious man; and then her good temper is imperturbable, except on points where placidity would be no virtue—and she is under my protection of that quiet cousin. If she sees the slightest mark of inattention to her, she is aroused in a moment, and her constant waiting on and for her, kind! Let me assist you, Juliet, dear,' and 'Come sister, cousin Juliet,' are very sweet and engaging."

"Well, well, I suppose it is all right," returned Revlere.

"But you won't go to-morrow? make up your mind to remain and join our party. You don't know but that you may have a chance to aid me by entertaining the crowd while I broach my suit."

Revlere consented, and his friend left him to engage others, and to make arrangements with Mr. S——— about furnishing the rations.

The next morning all the younger and a few of the senior guests assembled for their day's expedition. Mrs. Chilton appeared, habited in a green silk spencer, and a straw hat, jauntily over her curls,—a coarse palm-leaf sombrero, procured at a neighboring store; a gaudy, many-colored gingham handkerchief pinned smoothly over her bodice, and showing her shapely figure to advantage, and the remainder of her costume disposed in accordance. Every one said, and some really thought that she looked prettier and more piquant than usual, and there was an expression of admiration in the countenance of Hazelhugh, as he led off in the van.

The day was charming, the site selected for the course of operations appropriate and delightful,—a grassy glade on the bank of a beautiful stream, with the trees meeting overhead, and the ground at its feet. The refreshments were excellent,—rendered doubly so by the keen appetites to which they ministered, and the party were unanimous in saying that they had never engaged in a fête champêtre with so little to complain of their enjoyment. The mid-day collation over, the exuberance of their hilarity had a little subsided, and they dispersed in different parties, to amuse themselves as their particular fancies might direct, upon his enthusiasm regarding the lady he attended as more worthy of his soft nothings than he had ever deemed her in the crowded saloon, and each lady better disposed to receive them trustingly. Revlere alone had no one who particularly demanded his attention; and feeling no disposition to attach himself to any of the groups through a general courtesy, he sauntered up to the stream to where the woods grew too thick and sombre to be inviting to the others, who, in their gaiety, unconsciously preferred the sunny and airy glades below. There, when he supposed he was far enough aloof from observation, he was about to stretch himself along, like the melancholy Jaques, "under an oak, whose antique root peeps out upon the brook that brawls along that wood," when a voice from beyond a thicket of willows and alders, betrayed that he had neighbors in that direction.

He recognized that he had been noticed, he walked forward, and discovered that it was Mrs. Chilton's servant woman, who was saying "You'll fetch your death a cold, Miss Juliet, a stain on this cold moss. Look'ee here! I brought her wet under, for it stains down like a cotton bag."

Miss Chilton was sitting near her, with a sketch book on her knee. This lady he had been introduced to on her arrival, but had seen little of her since. She seldom joined in the gay amusements of her cousin, but spent her time, when she was visible, in little attentions to the invalids about the establishment, and in walking out attended by the servants. He had, however, heard several of the old gentlemen pronounce her an exceedingly amiable, discreet, amiable young person. She answered his bow gracefully as he approached, and, rising from the bank, remarked, with a smile, "I suppose, Mr. Revlere, you think I look very much like a remarkable schoolgirl, sketching with all her might to look interesting."

He, of course, disclaimed the charge.

"I happened to stray hither," pursued the lady, "and was forcibly reminded by this gnarled and lonely willow, with its shadow in the water, of Shakspeare's expressive description—

'There is a willow grows nascent the brook
And shows its hoar leaves in the glassy stream.'

and it struck me as being the best scene for a representation of the death of Ophelia that I had ever met with. This mossy bank, from which it leans, is the very place for her to sit and weave her 'coronet weeds;' those high rushes opposite, and the gigantic trees meeting over the stream a little farther up, give a conscious grandeur to her fatal purpose, and the flashing of the water at some distance below, with the bright spots of sunshine on the grass, are a beautiful relief to the picture. Now, if you will find me one, artist enough to complete the figure, as when—

'Her clothes spread out
And, mermaid-like, they bore her up awhile,'

I shall be much indebted to you. I have commenced it, but half lost to go on."

Revlere looked with a complacent at the sketch, which was one of remarkable boldness and fidelity, with the shadowy outline of the figure expressive

"I shall be present at the ball to-night. My critical instinct that I shall accompany him, and I may there have an opportunity to give you an opinion."

Ah, but or two afterwards, the ball room was thronged for the ball, with the fair widow conducting the festivities, and the willing cousin, standing out on the ball a magnificent evening dress, which she was enjoying with all the celebration of dancing, and the gaiety of the scene.

"I shall, you must wear it, dear Juliet, if only to gratify me;—I am resolved upon it," said Mrs. Chilton, emphatically, and taking up the dress.

"I suppose I must, then, if you are resolved," replied her cousin; "it is hardly out in a day to let you have your determination."

"There, now, you will look something like yourself! Bring me the box at the bottom of that trunk, Dorothy."

The servant handed out an ebony box, beautifully opened, and as she did so, displayed a collection of jewels, which a princess might have coveted. Miss Chilton took up a set of pearls.

"Ornaments!" exclaimed Mrs. Chilton, snatching them from her; "nothing but diamonds ought to accompany that superb dress! Here, Dorothy, clasp these bracelets for her,—now the necklace. What a pity that there are couples one-pendants can't go along! why you are the oddest girl,—the only one I know, I believe, who has never had her ears prepared for ornaments. I suppose you value yours as too finely made to be disfigured with punctures."

"Not that exactly; but, as I have told you twenty times, I regard a metal or a mineral pendant, hanging from the flesh, as a monument of barbarism too ornamental to be practised in our day."

"Just like; but hold down your hand till I arrange this bracelet."

"No, Caroline, I believe I won't wear it to-night."

"Why not?"

"Because you have worn it yourself, and it strained on much attention that it would be recognized."

"The very reason why I wish you to put it on; it will help my pint admirably. Here, now, hold down, like a good girl."

"I should very much like to know what that pint is."

"All in good time, dear. How lovely you do look!" said the widow, affectionately kissing her cheek. "You may go down, Dorothy. How the creature will stare when you make your appearance! I wonder what Mr. Revlere will think of you, Juliet!"

"That I have grown very fine all at once, no doubt."

"Is that all, cousin?" and Mrs. Chilton looked in her face with an arch but keen expression of her black eyes. "How well he would suit you! he is so refined, so elegant, so intellectual, so conversation! Has he popped the question, yet, Juliet?"

Miss Chilton laughed. "And what if he has?"

"A wedding, of course, I presume;" and the widow, looking more serious.

"That long not been concluded upon yet, dear Caroline. I promised him an answer to-night."

"And to-night, I suppose I shall be expected to put my Lothario, Mr. Hazelhugh, out of suspense. Well, Juliet, I don't wonder at your hesitation. The master should and loves, it would not disturb me in the least, yet I can't help feeling a little nervous. He would suit me pretty well, though, don't you think? He is good looking, animated, and exhibit—I mean, I suppose, he is considered that amiable. Come, cousin Juliet! but indeed I am not in love,—I am only looking at the proprieties of the thing. I know he is not what you would look for, that he would prove a husband for me more than fifty times more stability and sentimentality, would suit me. But I'll go down and walk about a little in the fresh air, before it is time to go into the dancing room."

"But you are not fully dressed yet, are you? let me assist you."

"I don't intend to wear anything more. This plain book-muslin, without ornaments, is more appropriate for one than all the finery I have been figuring in; yes! I think I will put pearls in my hair, instead of yours in my hair. There, how does that look?" and the new half thoughtful Mrs. Chilton left Juliet to her meditations, and went down into one of the parlors, to the window of which, she knew, there was no a few minutes before. They had gone, and as if destiny willed it, the only occupant of the room she found to be Hazelhugh. He advanced to meet her with some trepidation.

"I have just heard that you intend leaving us to-morrow," said he.

"So Miss Chilton and I propose;" she returned, preparing herself for what was to follow.

"You will not let me persuade you of my claim! —of your promise to decide upon my proposals against you should be ready for your departure."

"I acknowledge it, and you shall hear the result, but not just now. I am half sorry I ever had anything to say to you," she added, laughingly; "I don't believe you are one to be trusted; that you would cleave to a woman through evil as well as good report, through prosperity as through adversity."

Hazelhugh returned a hundred protestations, but that were the same as are usual upon such occasions, it is unnecessary to repeat them.

"Well, as I promised you a serious answer, I suppose I am in duty bound to give it; so, when I am tired of dancing, to-night, you shall have it."

But Mrs. Chilton could not long be left to a tête-à-tête. She was observed through the windows, and her self-constituted courtiers came gathering in. Her change of dress was immediately noticed, and it was thought, on all sides, that simplicity of style suited the contour of her face and figure remarkably—it made her look so classic;—and the throughout question, "Beauty when unadorned, adorned the most," was handled about often enough to be quite worn out.

The time at length came for entering the ball-room and Mrs. Chilton went up for Juliet. She calculated with the effect that would be produced by her appearance of her cousin. All the eyes in the room were turned towards them when they entered, but instead of following herself, as usual, they remained fixed upon her cousin. She remarked it, and seemed to enjoy it as much.

"Who is that with Miss Chilton?" was one question that reached her.

"Is that—can that be the cousin?" was another and the speaker drew nearer for a closer view.

"Is it possible that all those glittering ornaments are diamonds? I wonder if they are Mrs. Chilton's?" said a young lady.

"The dress can't be Mrs. Chilton's at all events,—it fits too well," returned another.

Revlere approached with his face so full of surprise and devoted admiration, that Mrs. Chilton, presuming that he would wish to give utterance to them, immediately took the arm of Hazelhugh, who had followed him, and walked another way.

"Who is that queenly-looking girl that entered with you, Mrs. Chilton?" asked a gentleman newly arrived.

"My cousin, Miss Chilton, sir; she does, indeed, look what queens 'ought to be, not as they are;' I would rather have the beauty of Juliet Chilton, than that of any queen who has lived since Cleopatra!"

"Mrs. Chilton, shall I ask you the favor to introduce me to your cousin?" solicited a young exquisite, particularly remarked for neglecting every lady who did not bear the stamp of fashion and fortune.

"Yes, sir, I shall be happy to introduce you to her," answered the widow, with unusual hauteur.

"She can't be an humble companion, after all;—I wonder what she can be?" said an elderly lady, looking hard through her spectacles.

"It cannot very strongly," returned a neighbor dowager. "I do believe the flounce on that splendid dress is pure Brussels lace! I never, indeed, saw thread lace so wide, but from the way it sets, it can't be anything else. When I have a chance to get near it I'll look." An opportunity to satisfy their curiosity was soon afforded them, for in a few minutes Revlere led Miss Chilton in front of them for a galopede.

"This is the first time I have consented to dance for several years, and you must not ask me again," said she to her partner. She looked as if she had consented through sheer lightness of heart.

"Your dress is turned up a little, my dear," said one of the matrons behind her, with much severity; "come here, and I will arrange it,—now it is straight;" and as Juliet returned to her place, she added to her neighbor,—"I was right; it is real thread lace. It must have cost an enormous price. I shouldn't wonder if she was a fortune after all."

But after a while the company became more occupied with their own concerns. Mrs. Chilton having announced that it was her last evening, was pressed with attentions, at least so her manner of receiving them implied. She was much less complaisant than formerly, and seemed to remark, with a triumphant satisfaction, that her cousin, with her magnificent dress and transcendent beauty, as it was pronounced, was the wonder of the room; and she even appeared to take pleasure in placing herself, with her stain sister, near her, as if for a foil. At length the hour came which Mrs. Chilton had set apart for the gentleman of it to Juliet, who, absorbed in the eloquence of her lover, was in happy forgetfulness.

Instantly a host assembled round the widow, regretting, in the most approved fashion, that they were to part with her so soon; the young people inquiring if they should meet her the next year, and where, and the old ones pressing their invitations upon her if she should ever visit their neighborhoods.

She replied courteously to each, and then said, as if and aside, to Revlere, who had not appeared to be making a speech, "I owe you all a thousand thanks, ladies and gentlemen, for your unwarned attentions since I arrived an entire stranger among you. Should you ever visit the sunny south, I promise you, each and all, a hospitable welcome at the residence of my cousin Miss Chilton, Lothian Place, Alabama. I am confident, dear Juliet, that you will be kind enough, as you always have been, to receive my friends as your own, and I invite them to your home."

Miss Chilton gave her a graceful assurance, and, attended by her amused suitor, left the room. When they had gained the piazza, and were beyond observation, he took the hand, which rested on his arm in silence.

"You are waiting for your answer," said she, looking frankly and confidingly in his face; "it is unquestionably—yes. I ask no further proofs of your character than I have already received, and am proud that I have a fortune to offer you in return for your generous disinterestedness. I rejoice in the mistake which has proven to me an attachment that I can find for myself alone. But we shall be observed. Good night! you go at six in the morning,—I do not say be ready to see us off."

Very different were the feelings of the couple that followed them. Hazelhugh firmly, but with some what less ardor than he, perhaps, was aware of, alluded again to his proposals, and requested an answer.

Mrs. Chilton drew her hand from his arm, and returned seriously, "You consider yourself bound as a gentleman, Mr. Hazelhugh, to allow your proposals to stand, but as a woman possessed of proper self-respect, and of principles to honorable as your own, I could not for a moment consider the offer of this but trifled. They were made to me, not to my own character, but in that of a wealthy heiress, which I supported, partly for amusement, and partly to test the probability of a blind devotion to the rich and the great.

"My fortune really, as you have just heard, the owner of the handsome estate which were pronounced to be mine, and when we discovered the impossibility in my favor, she insisted that it should not be mine. And, as it would cause her from the opprobrium of which she had long been unwarned, I gratified her positively,—in one instance did I ever use an expression to confirm it; but I could not take leave of this without seeing her, if only for one night, to relate the action to which my help of her personal, mental and moral qualities is entitled, but which can only of her fortune can attract, nor, I confess, without an effort to mortify those who treated her with such unmeasurable contempt. Though she was not owner of my purpose, her presence assisted me in its execution. For myself, I am a dependent on her kindness, and through not a relation by blood, I have received from her all the generosity that could have been shown by a sister. Again, I ask you totally from your proposals. The next time don't not from conjectures, nor judge from appearances. Good-bye."

He attempted to laugh, but the hand she had held not to him trembled as she drew it away, and he saw, or fancied he saw, that there was a tear in her eye. He felt at the moment that his feelings were more deeply concerned than he had believed, and he would have detained her, but she hastily turned away and disappeared up the stairs.

The next morning, on coming down to their early breakfast, the ladies found Revlere waiting for them, prepared also for a departure, and he begged to be allowed to attend them to the nearest city, and as much further as might be agreeable to them. Mrs. Chilton looked somewhat pensive, and occasionally threw an anxious glance around when any of the different groups entered, but the disappointment dispersed after they had set off, which Juliet accounted for by the circumstance that Hazelhugh had hurriedly approached down the piazza as they were driving off, and stood kissing his hand and looking after them as far as they could see him.

After spending a month or two longer in the northern and middle states, they returned in safety to their beautiful southern home, where preparations were to be immediately commenced for the marriage of Juliet and Revlere.

Among the letters waiting for them, there was one for Mrs. Chilton, postmarked at the Springs, and a merry laugh from her, while she was reading it, attracted the attention of Juliet.

"What have you there?" she asked.

"A letter from Hazelhugh,—no, you shan't read it. Half of it would be only nonsense to a third person, but I'll tell you the purport. He confesses frankly that he was first attracted by my reported fortune, but protests that I wronged him by supposing it was for that alone he sought my hand. He says that I did not, perhaps, in my assumed character, act as he would, he was hardly prepared to request it, as he did not fully understand his own feelings, until reflecting upon my spirit, moral courage and so forth, revealed them to him. That I am the only person in the world who would make him happy, and so forth. But you have had plenty of love letters of your own, find out the rest by them! Such things are all pretty much alike."

"Shall you show him, dear Caroline?"

"What right have you to his secrets before he knows them himself! However, as you are the only person I look up to at all, I will compliment you by asking your consent. May I take him, cousin Juliet?"

"My inclination says no, but as there might be danger of your running off with somebody else, I submit to prudence, and pronounce a reluctant affirmative."

"Thank you, my discreet guardian; and merely add an invitation, and I'll write to him, as he begs me, and let him come on with Revlere."

FROM THE LADY'S BOOK FOR JANUARY.

A DISCONTENTED MIND TO THE NIGHT.

BY MISS JOANNA BAILLIE.*

How thick the clouds of Night are ranged o'er head!
Confusing darkness o'er the earth is spread.
The clouded moon her cheering count'nance hides,
And feeble stars between the ragged sides
Of broken clouds, with difficulty shine.
Look through to mock the traveller on his way.
Tree, bush and ragged rock, and hollow dell,
In deeper shades their forms her dimly tell.
To cheat the weary wanderer's doubtful eye.
While chilly, fitful winds come ruffling by;
Of tangled thickets perplex the darkened pass;
And slimy reptiles glimmer on the grass;
And stinging night-flies spread their quickened spite—
Inhospitable are thy shades, Oh Night!

Now hand suspicious bars the creaking door,
And safe within the selfish worldlings snore;
And wealth's fed slaves are lulled in soft repose;
And houseless beggars shelter in the shed;
And nestling coveys cower beneath the brake,
While prowling ravenous beasts the forest roar;
Each hole and den sends forth its curtsed brood.
And hungry, savage creatures range the wood.
The chirping cricket plies his thrilling note;
Beneath the friendly shelter of the shade;
While bolder risk the lawless robber brows
The day for fools was made, and night for knaves.

Now welcome unveil'd moon! thy light display,
And guide a weary traveller on his way.
Hill, wood and vale are bright'ning in her beam,
And wavy silver glitters on the stream;
The distant pathway shows distinct and clear,
Free from the inviting, fearful shades of night;
For blacker shadows gain deceitful length,
And smaller objects strange, unwonted strength.
Each step, distinctly marked, I tread secure;
A shining gutter from a glistening stone.
Its wayward shadows lie across the ground.
The cheerful moonlight plays the thrilling note;
Deceitful are thy smiles, untoward Night!
Thy gloom is better than deceitful light.
Then welcome to thy shade, and welcome all
And all this glaring show is darkness vile.
Yet see how soon the floating shade is past,
Thy gloom is better than the sunshine's waste.
Shadows again are born upon the wind;
Succeeding brightness travels fast behind.
And how is love to be discovered Night!
Pie on the tricks! be either dark or light!
Yet take thy will, whate'er thy changes be,
I was a fool to part from them.

☞ The state of the market at Alexandria, La., is thus described by the Red River Whig: "Venison continues dear meat, though mutton is cheap. Rabbits do not vary a hare from the former range. Fish hardly rise to the line. Ducks and geese are hooked. Oysters still go down, though it is hoped, as the weather is cool, some will come up. Ice the holders in New Orleans are shellish. Ducks (on a credit) require good bills; and will geese go off promptly. Water has fallen very much in the last week; umbrellas were constantly up, and the river has a 'downward tendency.' Puns are at a discount, from the enormous quantity of bad ones in the market; some are thought to be second hand."

☞ "Of all vices," said one joker to another yesterday, "I consider gaming the very worst. Gambling is not in the nature of man, it is not inherent—it is an acquired sin. Man only gambles—dogs, cows, horses, they never gamble." "Yes they do," retorted the other. "Dont they, according to the poet, ——— gamble on the rain!"

☞ In a Court report in the Boston Post, it is stated that since the Bankrupt law went into operation, many affecting incidents have transpired—such as the wives of husbands who were too poor to pay one cent on a dollar being obliged, to give up their gold watches to their grasping creditors, and even surrender up their silver forks.

☞ Two gentlemen of different political views, travelling in a railway car the other day, entered into conversation. After talking awhile on the news of the day, "Sir," said one of them, "what are your political principles? Are you a Coon?" "No, sir," replied the other, with much gravity, "I am a Clam eater!"

☞ One of the Boston constables has had a new professional card printed, on which is the following lamentation. "How long shall the land mourn, and the herbs of every field wither, for the wickedness of those that dwell therein."

☞ The Troy (Ohio) Times says that a man was fined ten dollars by the court in that place, for kissing a married lady; and adds, "It may be well to state for the sake of girls that there is not any law against kissing them."

☞ Some bulls are touching. We cannot smile at the remark of the poor Irishman, who, when stretched upon a hospital cot, said, "I think I'd get better but for the thought of having nowhere to die."

☞ A famous musician who had made his fortune by marriage, being requested to sing in company, "operatic song," said he, "to imitate the nightingale, who never sings after he makes his nest."

☞ A Western editor wants to know whether the laws recently enacted against carrying concealed weapons, apply to doctors who carry their pills in their pockets.

☞ "Sir Robert Peel thinks a great deal of himself," says a London paper. A contemporary replies that "he is just the man to trouble himself about trifles."

☞ An exchange paper says it is very foolish for two young ladies to hate each other, on account of a gentleman who don't care a fig for either of them.

☞ Flimwood is so scarce in some parts of the Middle States, that a man with a wooded leg is afraid to venture out after dark, for fear of being robbed.

☞ They catch quails with nets in Iowa. A party of four gentlemen recently bagged one hundred in the vicinity of Burlington in a few hours.

☞ Bishop Mc Ychonan says, "he no wonder we have so many drunk people in America, come our language so hard nobody can learn it."

☞ Postpone nothing that you can do as well at the present, as at any future time.

☞ Envy is like a cow eye, influenced by every thing brilliant or dazzling.

☞ A lady who had refused to give, after having already promised, had her pocket picked as she was leaving the church. On reaching the discovery, she exclaimed, "If the Lord could not find the way into my pocket that Old Nick could!"

"Sam, are ashamed," said a lady to her husband, inquiring, "going to have a calf cutlet." "Not at all my dear," he replied, "I have seen drawing your cause I have known you."

OUR MESS.

Jack Hinton, the Guardsman.

CHAPTER LVI.

ST. DENIS.

We were both suddenly awakened from a sound sleep in the cabriole, by the loud cracking of the postillion's whip, the sounds of street noises, and the increased rattle of the wheels over the unequal pavement. We started up just as, turning round in his saddle, and pointing with his long whip to either side of him, the fellow called out—

"Paris, monsieurs, Paris! This is Faubourg St. Denis;—there before you lies the Rue St. Denis. Sacristi, the streets are as crowded as at noonday."

By this time we had rubbed the sleep from our eyes and looked about us, and truly the scene before us was one to excite all our astonishment. The Quartier St. Denis was then in the occupation of the Austrian troops, who were not only billeted in the houses, but bivouacked in the open streets—their horses picquetted in long files along the pave, the men asleep around their watchfires, or furnishing arms and accoutrements beside them. The whitecloud cuirassier from the Danube, the native and sinewy Hungarian, the tall and swarthy Croat, were all there, mixed up among groups of peasant girls coming in to market with fowls and eggs. Carts of forage and waggons full of all manner of provisions were surrounded by groups of soldiers and country people, trading amicably together, as though the circumstances which had brought them together were among the ordinary events of commerce.

Treading our way slowly through these, we came upon the Jäger encampment, their dark green uniform and brown carbines giving that air of sombre to their appearance, so striking after the steel-clad cuirassier, and the bright helmets of the dragoons. Farther on, around a fountain, were a body of diamond dragoons, their tall colpacks and scarlet trowsers bespeaking their Polish lineage—their small but beautifully-formed white horses pawed the ground, and splashed the water round them, till the dust and foam rose high above them. But the strangest of all were the tall, gigantic figures, who, stretched full, side of their horses, slept in the very middle of the wide street. Lifting their heads lazily for a moment, they would gaze on us as we passed, and then lie down again to sleep. Their red hands hung in loose folds upon their breasts, and their loose trowsers of a reddish dye but half concealed boots of undressed skin. Their tall lances were piled around them; but these were not wanting to prove that the Herculean figures before us were those of the guard of the Don, thus come for many a hundred mile to avenge the slaughter of Borodino and the burning of Moscow. As we penetrated farther into the city, the mixture of nation and costume became still more remarkable. The erect and soldier-like figure of the Prussian—the loose, wild-eyed Tartar—the brown-clad Russian, with russet beard and curved sabre—the stalwart Highlander, with nodding plume and waving tartan—the Bashkir, with naked accoutrement, the gorgeous hussar of Hungary—the tall and manly form of the English guardsman—passed and re-passed before us, adding, by the babel of discordant sound, to the wild confusion of the scene.

It was a strange sight to see the savage soldier from the steppes of Russia—the dark-eyed, heavy-browed Gallician—the yellow-haired Saxon—the rude native of the Caucasus—who had thus given themselves a "rendezvous" in the very heart of European civilization, wandering about—now stopping to admire some magnificent palace,
